HILIP, furnamed the Gift of God, from the time of Philip his birth, the Magnanimous, and the Conqueror, Augustus during his life-time, and, as if thele had fallen flort of his aftend, the merit, flyled Augustus after his decease, was, in truth, andgoone of the most extraordinary princes that ever fat upon verns from this or any other throne a. took his advice, and probably did nothing without it, yet all was executed, not only by his authority, but by himfelf. He was jealous that his youth, and want of experience, might expose him to contempt; and, therefore, the first instance he gave of his authority was, in ordering jesters, jugglers and buffoons to quit his court, and he took care to be obeyed b. The people complained loudly of the lews, who had got into poffellion of one third part of the lands in his dominions; and as, on the one hand, he found they had exercifed the most oppreflive usury, and, on the other, by choosing proper patrons, were powerfully fupported by the nobility, he obliged them to quit his terlitorics, allowing them to carry away their perfonal effates. This expulsion chagrined the great lords, but it pleafed the people, and the king was obeyed c. The mercenary foldiers who had ferved his father, and the king of England, being difbanded, and without means of maintaining themfelves, affembled together in great bodies, and committed enormous outrages. They were diftinguished by the feveral names of Cottereaux, Brabançons, Routiers, and Taverdins, nefting themfelves in different parts of the kingdom, and laying the country under contribution wherever they were. The king directed the great towns to make head against them, affisted them with his own troops, and in one action cut off nine thousand; fo that by degrees he either extirpated or expelled them all. He then directed the inhabitants of every great town, that held immediately of him, to furround it with walls, and to pave the ftreets; which work, as it was expensive and troublefome, was not at all relified; but, however, the king making a circuit in perfon for that purpofe, it was performed. Some of the nobility, taking the advantage of his father's infirmities, had committed exceffes, more efpecially against the clergy, which the king redrefied in perfon, and by force of arms; holding his grandfather's maxim, that the royal authority was to be extended by a zeal for juffice, and by fupporting the weak against the strong. As these great things required time to accomplifh, fo, as he began them early, he, until they were complete, made them the conftant objects of his attention.

to ruin the credit of Philip, count of Flanders, with the young king, more efpecially to prevent his completing his caba's, and marriage with his niece Ifabel; but their efforts were inef- infurrecfectual. That count was the king's godfather, from whom he received his name, and in those times this connexion was confidered as a kind of kindred; befides, he had adopted the young lady as his daughter, and beftowed prejed and upon her in dowry the county of Artois, and all the coun- Jubdued. try along the river Lysd. When the queen, and those of her party, found themfelves difappointed, they quitted the court, and having the young king of England with them, prevailed upon him to go over to his father, to demand his protection. In the mean time, the king caufed himfelf and his queen to be crowned at the abbey of St. Denis, by the archbishop of Sens, a circumstance which piqued the cardinal archbishop of Rheims extremely . Henry of England came over with his fon into Normandy, extremely well pleafed with this opportunity of interfering in the affairs of the king's family; but Philip and the count of Flanders, marching directly towards him with a numerous army, Henry, who was unwilling to come to extremities, demanded a conference, which did great honour to the abilities of the young king; for as, on the one hand, he remained firm in the measures he had taken, notwithftanding all the addrefs of this wife and great prince, fo, on the other, he would not liften to the arguments used by the earl of Flanders, to reject absolutely all propositions of peace. He profeffed great duty and refpect for his mother, offered to pafs by all that had happened, with respect to the lords of her faction, and to receive them again into his favour; an offer which they thought fit to accept<sup>f</sup>. It was not long before the count of Flanders began to be difgusted at this agreement, and to form intrigues in his turn, into which, amongst the first that entered, were the cardinal of Champagne and one of the queen dowager's brothers; the duke of Burgundy alfo, though a prince of the blood, embraced the fame party, and the avowed motives to their confederacy was the young monarch's popularity ". Philip, not caring to truft the nobility that ftill remained about him, raifed an army with hisown money; took one of the principal fortreffes of the duke of Burgundy; and init his ther, because he would not add the country of Maine to his dominions, and went in great difcontent, to Paris, where, being thrown from his horfe at a tournament, he died of the bruifes he received; king Philip retaining under his protection his widow, his daughter Eleanor, and his posthumous fon Arthur. " The count of Flanders and the emperor gave the king fome diffurbance, but his firmnefs and his good fortune foon extricated him out of thefe difficulties : but on the fide of the king of England he was able to procure no fatisfaction. At length he declared war; and having taken fome places of lefs confequence, befieged Chateauroux, in which were the two princes of England, Richard and John; but they made fo good a defence, that Henry had time to come to their relief; upon which Philip railed the fiege, and marched to give him battle ". At this juncture arrived a legate from the pope, A D.1187. to engage them to lay alide their private quarrels, and take ____ the crofs in favour of the Chriftians, from whom the famous Saladine had taken Jerufalem. Henry having folemply promifed, that, at their return from this expedition, all things fhould be adjusted to the fatisfaction of Philip, the two kings, and most of the great lords in both armies took the crofs, which, of his own free will, prince Richard had taken before °.

King Philip, in order to defray the expences of fuch A new a war, laid heavy taxes upon the clergy, at which they quarrel bemurmured exceedingly. The king, neverthelefs, cauled invert the them to be raifed, and they were diffinguifhed by the which name of the tax of Saladine. But while the king was Richard, thus employed, prince Richard, when it was leaft ex- count of pected, made a furious irruption into the territories of Poitou, Raymond, count of Thouloufe, in purfuance of the old fides with guarrel, which Henry kept open, on purpole to afford gauff his colour for fuch incurfions. The monarch of France was jather. no fooner informed of this invation than he made a diverfion in favour of count Raymond, by invading the territories which Henry poffeffed in France P. That monarch, with an alacrity little fuitable to his years, advanced with an army to their relief; but his fuccefs was not equal to his fpirit. He therefore demanded a conference, at which he defired, that, inftead of Richard, the princefs Alice might espoufe his fon John, which propofal was rejected, there being a fecret underftanding between Philip and the prince of England 9. As for Richard, he was fo much incenfed, that he was very near killing the legate upon the fpot, and, being hindered, flewed his refentment by doing homage to king Philip, and retiring to the French camp ; fo that these broils, which had been fo lately appeafed, were now more inflamed than ever '.

Peace once more re-Aored. which is king Henry's death.

The king, with prince Richard, as foon as they were able to affemble troops fufficient, attacked the city of Mons, which, though it was the ftrongeft place in all immediately Henry's French territories, was taken in the fpace of three followed by days, by an accident; for the governor having given directions for burning the fuburbs, this operation was performed in fuch a hurry, that the flame caught the town. King Henry, who was there in perion, efcaped with difficulty, being warmly purfued by Philip and Richard. He retired to Chinon, where he determined to defend himfelf to the laft extremity; but, before things were brought to this pafs, the count of Flanders, and other great lords, reprefented to king Philip, that they could not, with a fafe confcience, ferve him against a monarch who had taken the crofs, and thereby impede the recovery of Jerufalem; a declaration which conftrained him once more to admit of a conference<sup>s</sup>. The two kings difcourfing together on horfeback, were parted by a dreadful clap of thunder, which broke between them. However, they came together again, and, after three hours conversation, the terms of the peace were fettled ; the places taken from the king of England were to be reflored, king Philip was to have a large fum in ready money, Richard was to be crowned as his brother Henry had been, and then to efpouse the princes Alice; but this folemnity was to be deferred till their return from the Holy Land, and, in the mean time, the princefs was to be put into fuch hands as Philip fhould approve. When all was adjusted, Henry obferved to Philip, that princes had a common interest against traitors, and infifted fo passionately to see the affociation, by which he had been invited to invade his dominions, that at length his requeft was granted '. But as

By this event Philip loft a dangerous and implacable enemy, and his friend Richard, whom he had always fupported against his father, acquired that crown he had to eagerly purfued, though, in fome meafure, at the expence of his reputation, the world in general condemning his conduct.

They then con- Holy Lant cluded an alliance as kings, and fwore perpetual fidelity againd the as friends, without confidering that their manners were too much alike for any oaths to reftrain, or leagues to bind them. They were in their perfons tall, well-made, and robust men; active, brave, magnificent, free in their difcourfe, and full of a fprightly kind of wit, that however bordered upon levity : their vices also were much the fame, for they were ambitious in a fupreme degree, hafty in their tempers, addicted to women, avaricious, or rather greedy of money, that they might fquander; and, in fine, immoderately fond of praife, and ready to run any hazard to acquire it. The expedition to the Holy Land appeared to these princes an enterprize that was to cover them with immortal glory; and having once entertained this notion, they could neither of them be brought to confider it in another light ". Some of the wifeft men in his council laboured to undeceive Philip, and to diffuade him from going in perfon; but his mother, and the cardinal de Rheims, out of an ambitious defire of governing in his abfence, frustrated their intention. He took, however, the precaution of limiting their authority by an inftrument, to which he gave the name and form of a Teftament, and appointed overfeers to look to its execution. Before his departure he received the homage of the queen dowager of England for the duchy of Guienne, which she held in her own right. To defray the expences of this prodigious armament, he exposed to fale the great charge of his houshold, the domain of the crown, and whatever elfe would fetch money. All things being adjusted, the two kings marched with their armies as far as Lyons. There Philip took the route of the Alps, in order to embark at Genoa, and Richard proceeded to the coaft in order to meet his fleet, which was appointed to rendezvous at Marfeilles, under a folemn engagement to meet again in Sicily, and to proceed from thence, in conjunction, to the coaft of Syria *.

Tancred was at this time in poffellion of that illand, tions in Si- with the regal title; but he was held to be an intruder in prejudice to Constance, the wife of the emperor Henry, with whom Philip was in close alliance: on the other hand, he held the queen-dowager Joan clofe prifoner, who kings, Phi- was king Richard's fifter, and confequently had no great reafon to be fond of fuch guefts. Philip arrived first, and was tolerably well treated, and behaved civilly on his fide. When Richard arrived, he demanded that his fifter should be prefently fent him, and full fatisfaction made for the large legacies left to his father by the deceased king of Sicily; a demand which Tancred laboured to decline. Upon this refufal Richard attacked the city of Meffina, and was very near coming to a rupture with king Philip, who, with part of his forces, was in the city when it was attacked. He confented, however, to admit of his mediation; by the decree of the French king, Tancred was to be left in peaceable poffettion, and to pay king Richard forty thousand ounces of gold in full fatisfaction for his claims y. Tancred, who had flattered himfelf with the French king's protection, was fo much vexed with the difappointment, that he made his court to king Richard, and produced to him a letter, whether forged or genuine is not very clear, in which Philip encouraged him to attack the English, and particularly their king, with a promife to affift him with all his forces. This difcovery produced, as he expected, a very high quarrel between thefe princes; Richard charged Philip with having attempted his life, and Philip accufed Richard of infifting upon a forged letter, and publishing many falshoods 2. But, after all, their interefts obliged them to be friends; and they therefore thought it beft to difcuss the real dispute between them, which was the marriage of the princefs

Alice,

Alice, a point which Richard without ceremony rejected, becaufe his mother was treating of another marriage for him in Navarre; but he very honourably offered to reftore the places that had been fo long detained for her dowry. The treaty being, without much difficulty, adjusted, a new mifunderstanding happened. Philip infisted that Richard, A.D. 1190, with his forces, fhould depart with him, a ftep which the king of England declared to be impoffible, becaufe he had a mind to wait for his young wife, whom his mother had promifed to bring thither. Philip, afraid that he fould return into France, and attack his dominions in his abfence, laboured all he could to induce the French lords that followed Richard to proceed with him; and, having engaged the greatest part of them, failed for the coast of Syria, leaving the king of England in Sicily *.

At the time of his arrival, Philip found the affairs of The contlthe Chriftians in a very untoward fituation. They were nual quarengaged in the fiege of Acon, or Ptolemais, having lain rels bebefore it more than a year, which in reality was no great tween Phi-wonder, confidering that for the beft part of the great lip and wonder, confidering that, for the best part of the time, Richard, the army without was fcarce equal to the garrifon within. end at last As if these difficulties had not been enough, the Christians in the forwere upon bad terms with each other, on account of a divided title to the kingdom of Jerufalem, which city was in the hands of the infidels, Guy de Lufignan had been acknowleged king in right of his wife, who was the cldeft fifter of the laft monarch : but this princefs being dead, without leaving any iffue, the marquis of Montferrat claimed the crown in right of the youngest fister, who was his confort; whereas Guy infifted that, having once been invested with the regal dignity, he was king for life . . When king Richard landed, after having conquered the island of Cyprus by the way, he augmented the confusion, for he took part with Guy de Lufignan, who was his fubject; and, perhaps, it was chiefly for this reafon that Philip took part with the marquis of Montferrat. With much difficulty things were fo far compromiled, as that all proceedings were fufpended till the place was taken. which being vigoroufly attacked, was quickly yielded by capitulation. As foon as Acon was in the hands of the Chriftians, Philip took a refolution of returning into his own dominions, becaufe the climate was prejudicial to his health; and that he might not remain in the fame country with Richard, who, if the French hiftorians are to be believed, was continually raifing new quarrels, and always in the wrong. If we liften to other authors, thefe practices ought not to be afcribed to Richard but to Philip . It is very probable they might be both in the wrong, but it is very certain they could never agree, and therefore Philip's refolution of leaving the army might not be to injurious to the common caufe as it is generally reprefented. At parting he left a confiderable body of French troops under Eudes of Burgundy, with orders to obey Richard, to whom alfo he promifed, with a folemn oath, not to attack his dominions, or to difpoffefs any of his vaf-A.D. 1191. fals. But how fincerely he acted in this matter may appear from hence; that, landing in the kingdom of Naples, he took Rome in his way home, and earneftly folicited pope Celeftin III. to abfolve him from the oath which he had taken to Richard, but without effect d. He landed in France about Chriftmas, and was received with great joy by his fubiects, though the manner in which he had left the Holy Land did not raife his reputation with other princes.

> It appeared foon after his return, that he had an implacable averfion, and, at the fame time, a deep dread of the English monarch. The marquis of Montferrat had been flain in the midft of the city of Tyre, by fome of the Affaffins; a bold and barbarous nation, from whofe practices this word has been adopted into most languages. Philip no fooner heard of this incident than remembering that Richard was the enemy of the marquis, he conjectured that he had applied to the Old Man of the Mountain, fo the prince of those wicked men was ftyled, and had procured from him these instruments of his vengeance; from whence he deduced this confequence, that, being no lefs hated by Richard, he might be in as much danger. Upon this reflection, by the advice of his council, he formed a particular corps of guards, armed with iron maces, whom he had about his perfon night and day, and who fuffered no ftranger to approach him . He likewife difpatched ambaffadors, with rich prefents, to pacify the prince of the Affaffins; but, when they came to his court, the Old Man of the Mountain told them plainly, that he had no refentment against their master; that he had ncver been folicited by the king of England to his prejudice. and that he had caufed the marquis of Montferrat to be killed, becaufe he looked upon him as his enemy, and without having any correspondence with Richard f. Philip in the mean time having his head full of intrigues, entered into a close alliance with John, the brother, but the mortal enemy of king Richard. His own queen Ifabella being dead in his absence, he resolved to marry Ingerberge, the daughter of Waldemar, and the fifter of Canute king A. D. 1902. of Denmark, without any other portion than the tranfferring to him the whole claim of the Danes upon England, and affording him the affiftance of a fleet ; but the court of Denmark declining this propolition, he was content to take this princefs with the fmall fortune that they offered. Before her arrival, the marriage was not very acceptable to the French 5; though her merit procured her afterwards the effeem of the whole nation.

It feems that Richard had intelligence of these proceed- Philip enings in Syria; and on account of them, as well as becaufe ters into ings in 6914 , and of ficknels, he determined to return: but with f and fDalmatia, and endeavouring to pafs in difguife through brother the country of Leopold, duke of Auftria, whom he had king highly offended at the fiege of Acon, he was discovered Richard. and taken prifoner. After much ill ufage, the duke fold him to the emperor Henry VI. who was of a harfh difpofition, necellitous, and avaricious. He gave notice of this event, as an acceptable piece of news to king Philip, who offered him a large fum of money for his prifoner, which he refufed b. The king and prince John now entered into a new contract, by which the latter was to deliver up feveral places, and to leave the king at liberty to defpoil Richard of what he thought proper in Normandy, while he himfelf used his utmost endeavours to get posselfion of the crown of England. In order to give thefe difhonourable measures some kind of colour, Philip fent to denounce war against Richard in his prilon, and then affembled an army to invade his territories. The nobility of France obeyed him very unwillingly; they put him in mind of his oath, of the fcandal of attacking a prince who was still under the cross, and the inhumanity of making war upon one who was in no condition to refift him. Phi-Jip pretended that he had no intention to fpoil Richard of his dominions, or to take any thing but what of right belonged to himfelf, infifting chiefly on the treaty that had been made between them in Sicily, in which Richard had flipulated to deliver up the town of Gifors and the Vexin: he added, that he was bound to deliver up his fifter, who was kept prifoner in the citadel of Rouen<sup>1</sup>. He quickly regained the places which he claimed, and afterwards made himfelf mafter of Evreux, which he gave to prince John, the caftle excepted, into which he put a firong garrifon. He alfo befieged Rouen without effect. There is no doubt that this usage must have initated Richard. who, notwithstanding, found himfelf obliged to diffemble; for having discovered that the emperor was inclined to fell him to Philip, or at least to take money to keep him in prifon, he directed William, bifliop of Ely, his chancellor, to pafs over into France, and folicit king Philip to defift from thefe intrigues, allowing him to make the beft A. Out of mere flame, and in order to avoid the reproaches of his nobility, the king confented, and the old queen-dowager, with infinite difficulty, procured him the best part of his ranfom : "but we may judge of the true disposition of Philip by the meffage he fent to prince John, when he heard that king Richard was at length releafed, " Take care of yourfelf, for the devil is unchained k."

Richard pajes with an army into France, and gains fome adwantages over Philip. Richard had prevailed upon the emperor, and the moft confiderable princes in Germany, to threaten Philip with an invafion, if he did not furrender all the places he had taken. The king, confidering thefe menaces as a declaration of war, invaded Normandy, and befieged Verneuil; and Richard paffed with an army, and a fleet of upwards of a hundred fail, from England, and debarked at Barfleur, from whence he marched with great rapidity to give Philip battle. His brother John, who faw himfelf now at his mercy, refolved, if he could, to recover his favour, and, if pofible, his confidence. The method he took was ingular, as well as perfidious. He invited the French officers at Evreux to an entertainment, and, when they haddrank plentifully, caufed them to be cut topieces, to the number of three hundred, and placed their heads upon ftakes along the wall; a maffacie which to far had its effect, as it convinced the king his brother that a reconciliation with the French king would never be in his power. · Philip no fooner received thefe tidings than, leaving his camp in the night with a choice body of troops, he marched with fuch expedition, that he eafily furprifed Evreux. put all the English he found to the fword, with most of the inhabitants, and burnt the place to the ground 1. His revenge coft him very dear; his army, not being in the fecret of the expedition, finding the king gone, and having intelligence that Richard was very near, abandoned their camp and their baggage, and difperfed to their respective homes. There followed upon this a negociation, which came to nothing, becaufe Philip infifted upon an indemnity for those who had taken arms against Richard, to which this laft would not confent m. Philip being again in the field, the English monarch laboured all that was in his power to bring him to a battle; and, at length, finding him in the neighbourhood of Vendofme, encamped fo near that it could not well be avoided; Philip made use of an artifice, which failed him : he fent a meilage to Richard, that, if he remained on the fame ground, he would give him battle. The king of England returned for anfwer, that he would find him ready, and that if he failed he would come the next day and attack him. The defign of the king of France was to retire, which Richard penetrated. He therefore, began to advance as foon as the mellenger returned, attacked and routed the army on their march, and took the French chancery which then attended the king; fo that, by this unlucky accident, all the titles of the crown fell into the possession of Richard. to the irreparable lofs of the French nation". Philip, notwithflanding, made an irruption, not long after, into Normandy, with fuccefs; and though the pope's legate made great efforts to bring about a treaty, yet they produced only a truce, which lasted but a little time. The emperor, with the affiftance of king Richard, proposed to render the realm of France a fief of the empire °. deftroying their people, must necessarily turn to their mutual lofs, without rendering either of them great: therefore, in the month of November, they concluded a truce, and the next year a decifive peace, upon equal terms; by which the princess Alice recovered her liberty, and foon after espouled the count of Ponthieu, after having been the fource of fo much difcord and bloods between the two nations P.

The peace of Louviers, as it was called, from the place where it was made, feemed to promife a lafling tranquility to the dominions of the two kings; notwithitanding which it was broke in fix months. Philip pretended to take offence at king Richard's having dispossefield one of his vaffals, and razed his fortrefs; and, without making any application for redrefs, renewed the war by befieging Aumale. Richard was very foon in the field, and hoftilities were carried on for fome time with a variety of fuccefs. The English monarch, whom experience had taught caution, managed his affairs at this time with extraordinary addrefs. He detached the count of Thouloufe from the party of king Philip, by giving him his fifter Joan in marriage, the widow of William king of Sicily ; he brought over the Bretons to his intereft, by infinuating to the young duke Arthur, or rather to his minifters, that he might render him his fucceffor; and he engaged Baldwin earl of Flanders in his alliance, by fuggefting that it was the only way to recover the rich country of Artois, which, in virtue of his first marriage, Philip had reannexed to the crown. By thefe treaties, and by receiving all who were aggrieved, or thought themfelves aggrieved, by Philip, he caufed him to be attacked on every fide, and brought , him into very great difficulties 9. Philip, however, brought himfelf into greater; for giving a loofe to his refentment, and relying upon that good fortune which hitherto had attended him in his exploits, he exposed himfelf like a young man, without any confideration of the numbers he attacked, or was attacked by; which rafhnefs, though not fatal to himfelf, proved exceedingly to to the beft of his troops, and to the nobility most attached to his perfon. Hearing that Arras was befieged by the count of Flanders, he turned his whole forces on that fide, and marched againft him with a very numerous army. The count, knowing his inferiority, raifed the fiege, and retired : the king, hurried by his paffions, followed him till he found himfelf fo entangled in a country full of marfhes, dykes, and inclosures, that he was unable to advance, or to procure provisions for his army. In these circumstances he was conftrained to treat with the count, and, by fair promifes, procured his leave to retire . Upon this occasion, Baldwin became a mediator between the two kings, and laboured affiduoufly to make peace. His good intention was not followed by the fuccefs that he expected, and all that it produced was a truce for a year, when the war broke out again with greater fury than ever; till at length, pope Innocent the Third interpoling, the two kings confented to a truce for five years. It was on the pont of being A.D. 1199. broken almost as foon as it was made, if the infraction had not been prevented by the activity and addrefs of the cardinal legate, who managed feveral conferences between the two kings, and at laft brought them to relifh a plan for a folid peace; but, before it could be concluded, Richard was unfortunately flain before an inconfiderable caftle. which he belieged, in hopes of taking from one of his vaffals a great mais of gold, which he had found hid in the earth .

The death of Richard was one of the most fortunate King Phievents that could have fallen out for king Philip ; but be- lip compelfore we enter into any detail of the events that followed it, it may be requisite to give a fuccinct account of the queen Introubles that happened in France from the king's fecond gerberge, marriage. Though Ingerberge was a princefs of great and the beauty and merit, yet the king was fo difgusted the first night of their marriage, that he feparated from her immediately, and would have fent her home again, but as fhe appeared very averfe to returning, he contented himfelf with placing her in a monaftery, where the had a handfome allowance, and where her modefly, piety, and patience, gained her univerfal efteem t. This, however, did not hinder fome of the bishops of France from gratifying the king with a divorce, on the old pretence of alliance in blood, made out from a pedigree not over well founded. In virtue of which fentence, he thought himfelf at liberty to efpouse, three years after the marriage of this princefs, Agnes de Merania, daughter to the duke of Dalmatia; but upon the complaint of the king of Denmark to pope Celeftin, he caufed an enquiry to be made into this matter, and declared the fecond marriage null. Philip folicited pope Innocent for a reversion of his fentence, which was granted; yet it ferved only to create delay; and at length the cardinal legate intimated the pope's decree, that he was to put away Agnes, and take back his queen d. The king not complying, the pope proceeded to an interdict, which fublisted about feven months; at which Philip was fo provoked, that he feized the temporalities of the bishops, imprifoned the canons of cathedral churches, laid impositions on the inferior clergy, and at length taxed his lay fubjects in a most oppressive manner : all which fleps it was in his power to take, becaufe, contrary to the cuftom of his predeceffors, he kept up a flanding army of mercenary troops. He grew tired, however, of living in fuch a ftate of violence, and, applying to the pope, promifed entire fubmiffion, in cafe he would fuffer the divorce and the fecond marriage to be once more reviewed °. This conceffion was accepted, the interdict removed, and a council appointed at Soiffons to examine every thing afresh. Thither Philip repaired, and finding. in fpite of all his authority and address, that a decree would be pronounced against him, he fent the legate word. that he had fettled the affair himfelf : then leaving Soiffons. having first taken Ingerberge out of her convent, he carried her behind him on horfeback to Paris, where he owned her publicly for his queen; for grief of which Agnes foon after died : but the fon and daughter he had by her were legitimated by the pope; a circumftance which was but ill received in France, where the people were by no means edified with the pontiff's intermeddling in their affairs in fuch a manner, and more efpecially by pretending to regulate the fucceffion f.

Enters into a war with John king of England, which is ended by a marriage. On the death of Richard, John mounted the throne of England, and took poffefion likewife of his French dominions, in prejudice to his nephew Arthur, who, at the beginning, however, claimed only Anjou, Maine, and Touraine. The old queen-dowager Eleanor was fill living, and, by doing homage for Guienne, prevented that country from becoming the feat of war. She fided with her fon againft her grandfon, out of pique to his mother Conflance, who was, like herfelf, a princefs of very high fpirit. Philip, under colour of protecting Arthur, invaded Normandy, which John came in perfon to defend ; however, from the ficklenefs of his nature, he grew defirous of making peace at any rate; and Philip no fooner perceived this difpolition than he fet accommodation at too high a price even for John to purchase, notwithstanding the count of Flanders, who charged him with breaking his word, had deferted him, and taken part with the king of England. At length the old queen-dowager devifed an expedient, which proved fatisfactory to Philip 5. She propofed, that his fon and heir apparent Lewis flould efpoufe Blanch, the daughter of Alonfo king of Caftile, and niece of king John ; who, in cafe he died without heirs. was to entail the fucceffion to his effates in France on the iffue of that marriage, and in the mean time was to make a ceffion to king Philip of the county of Evreux in Normandy, with the Vexin and other territories, the rights of which had been long contefted. Thefe terms being ac- A.D. 1200. cepted, the old queen went into Spain to fetch the princels, who was to be the feal of this treaty; and the marriage being celebrated in Normandy, Arthur, whofe caufe was in fome measure abandoned, did homage to his uncle for the duchy of Bretagne : thus for the prefent, not without a great mixture of injuffice, tranquility was reftored ".

King John, who was a very voluptuous prince, had re- That pudiated Havife, the daughter of the earl of Gloucester; prince, by and having feen Ifabel d'Angoulême, who was contract - the murder ed, if not married, to Hugues le Brun, count of March, phene, acaufed her to be carried away from his houfe, and, by the fords Part confent of her father, married her. As this lady was lip an opnearly related to king Philip, he carried her to Paris, portunity of where they were treated with the utmost magnificence, feizing and difinified with all possible demostrations of the most cordial affection. This fituation of things very fuddenly changed; the count of March, refenting the injury done him, and drawing many of the nobility to whom he was allied in blood to his party, began fome troubles; which John, with great feverity suppressed. Complaints of his tyranny were made to king Philip, who wrote in firong terms to the king of England; and this laft promifed more than he intended to perform. From these small sparks a great flame enfued. Philip, who had mighty things in view, encouraged the young prince Arthur to fe himfelf at the head of the malecontents, conferred upon him the honour of knighthood, and furnished him with a large fum of money to raife forces. The first exploit this young prince attempted with his half-formed army, was the fiege of Mircheau, where his grandmother the old queen-dowager refided. King John, already landed in Normandy, marched with great forces to her relief, routed those of his nephew, and took him pritoner i. This fuccefs, which might have been highly advantageous to his affairs, proved his ruin; for having first transferred the poor young prince to Falaife, and from thence to the caffle of Rouen, when he found it utterly impoffible to detach him from the French intereft, he either murdered him with his own hand, or caufed him to be murdered, as almost all writers agree. This cruel act rendered him jufily odious to all his fubjects in France; and his mother applied for juffice to Philip, who fummoned him to appear and answer to this charge before the court of peers at Paris. Upon his refutal or delay, he declared him, according to the ordinary courfe of juffice, convicted of felony, and all the lands he h-ld as fiels from the crown of France, confifcated k. King John was at this time in a moft deplorable fituation ; the old queen his mother lately dead, most of his nobility in arms against him, fome of his ancient allies employed in the fourth croifade in Syria, fome de.d. and the reft detached from him ; fo that Philip had the faireft opportunity, as well as the moft plaufible pretence, for depriving him of Normandy, and the reft of his dominions in France, under colour of executing the fentence of the court of peers; and he was not a prince capable of letting flip even a lefs promifing occafion 1. A.D. 1202. But he did nothing precipitately; he took care to have all the forms of law on his fide, and, while, he was taking thefe precautions, he affembled a numerous army, with which he undertook the conqueft of Normandy.

Methods ujed by Phi hip to exsend she power of the crown at the expence of the great wajjals. In lefs than fix months, he either obtained, by intelligence of the principal inhabitants, or reduced by force, all the great towns in the Higher Normandy, while John remained at Caen in fuch a flate of inaction, as not only amazed that but all fucceeding ages. The ftrong fortrels of Chafteau Gaillard made a gallant defence; and John, as if he had waked out of a fleep, affembled a ftrong fleet and army for its relief; but a concurrence of unfortunate accidents rendering his efforts ineffectual, he, in a fit of diffraction, returned to England, and feemed to abandon all care of his dominions on the continent. Philip, taking advantage of this defertion, reduced all Lower Normandy with the fame facility; infomuch that John had nothing left but the city of Rouen, the inhabitants of which, from a true fpirit of loyalty and independency, defended themfelves bravely; neither did they furrender, till, acquainting John with their diffrefs, he returned them for anfwer, that, being able to afford them no relief, they must make the best terms for themselves they could : thus, A.D. 1201. after a feparation of three hundred years, Normandy was . again united to the crown of France m. This fuccefs, far from fatisfying, ferved only to raife and inflame the ambition of Philip, who carried the war into the countries of Maine, Anjou, and Touraine, the best part of which he fubdued. He faw clearly the fuperiority he had, and refolved to prefs it to the utmoft. The count of Flanders was in Syria, the count of Champagne a child under his tutelage, the count of Thouloufe embarraffed with the court of Rome, who treated him as a heretic; in fhort he was free from all the reftraints by which his predeceffors were in a manner tied down, and he thought the beft ufe he could make of it, was to transmit that liberty which himfelf enjoyed to his pofterity and fucceffors ". The only A.D. 1204 error he committed was shewing his fentiments too plainly, and behaving towards fome of the nobility as if that was already done, which was only in a fair way of being done; a thing inexcufeable in a politician; but, after all, even wife men are but men. Guy de Tours, who was become duke of Bretagne by the marriage of Conftance the mother of prince Arthur, and the heirefs of that duchy, had, during her life, acted as warmly as any against the English ; but that princefs being dead, and Guy perceiving plainly what was the intention of Philip, he laboured as much as in him lay to make king John fenfible of the weak part he had acted, and to perfuade him not to defert fuch of his fubjects as yet remained faithful, and were willing to rifk all to preferve what was ftill remaining of his dominions in France °. Moved by thefe remonstrances, and encouraged by his promifes, that monarch came with a fleet and army to Rochelle; but the fortune of Philip prevailed. John received at the beginning various checks, which made him glad to accept a truce for two years, and the duke of Bretagne, being left to the king's mercy, was forced to make peace upon the beft terms he could obtain; which was an event highly acceptable to Philip, who defired nothing fo much as an opportunity of punifhing or humbling his vafials P.

From the fame motive connives at the pope's publishing a croifade against the count of Thoulouse.

In the midft of these transactions, a new and very extraordinary fcene opened in France. The popes having found a way to raife armies, when, where, and against whom they pleafed, by the preaching of a few fanatical furious monks, refolved to make trial of it in Europe against those they flyled heretics, as they had done in Afia against the infidels. Raymond count of Thoulouse, who was a man of free principles, permitted perfons of all opinions to refide in his territories, provided their morals were found, and they did nothing against the public peace. These heretics, as they were styled, did not agree entirely in fentiments, and it was no wonder, fince, in reality, they had been driven out of the church of Rome by a clear fenfe of her corruptions, or were the remains of the ancient Gothic churches, who had never been in-fected with them 9. 'To thefe people, becaufe they lived about Albi, they gave the name of Albigeois; again.?t whom, at the inflance of Dominic and his difciples, pope Innocent the Third published a croifade, in order to exterminate with the fword fuch as would not be converted by preaching r. This pious committion was offered to king Philip, who refused it, but connived at the execution of it, or perhaps durft not oppofe it. Eudes duke of Burgundy, and afterwards Simon de Montfort, were at the head of these mifereants, who flyled themselves the army of the church, and blafphemoufly afcribed to God all the facrileges, robberies, and murders, which they committed ; defolating all the fine provinces in the fouth of France, deftroying not only those they flyled heretics, but alfo the Catholics that lived amongft them. Upon all thefe enormities Philip looked with filence, believing that the mileries the people fuffered, and the deftruction of nobility in those parts, would pave the way for extending his authority, the only object of which he never loft fight '.

The pope, having once got this new weapon in his hand, Is deceived imagined himfelf invincible, and was confequently for em- in his hopes ploying it wherever he found the least refistance. John of gaining king of England had refused to admit cardinal Stephen England in Langton in quality of legate from the holy fee, because he quality of a looked upon him as a man wholly devoted to France; and champion. this refufal provoked the pope to fuch a degree, that he put the kingdom of England under an interdict '. This brought a furious perfecution on the bishops who obeyed it, infomuch that they were obliged to take refuge in France. Pope Innocent, refolving to keep no farther meafures, excommunicated the king, and gave his dominions to the first occupier, affigning the fame indulgencies to fuch as fought against this prince, as if they had taken the crofs against the infidels. The legates from Rome having propoled this expedition to Philip, he readily undertook it on the fuppolition that fome time or other an attempt would be made to wring Normandy from him; believing it rather his interest to carry the war into England than to expect it at home. Befides, he was defirous to employ his fon prince Lewis, who, without his knowlege, and contrary to his intention, had taken the crofs against the Albigeois; which enterprize, he fupposed, might be difpenfed with by his fervice against the English ". Many great lords, either out of vain-glory, the defire of obtaining eftates in that ifland, or from pure caprice, applauded his defign, and promifed to follow him. Philip fpent much time in forming an army fuitable to fo great an undertaking, and in preparing a vaft fleet, which, if the French authors are to be credited, confifted of no lefs than feventeen hundred fail. The king of England, on the other hand, made alfo great preparations, affembled and army of fixty thousand men, and had also a formidable fleet at Portfmouth, upon which he might have relied; but either from his own fuspicions of the fidelity of his fubjects, or from the natural ficklenefs of his temper, he changed his fcheme on a fudden, made the meaneft fubmillions to the pope in the perfon of his legate, cardinal Pandolph, by which he procured abfolution, and when Philip expected all the affiftance that the authority of the fee of Rome could give him, he was threatened with an excommunication if he proceeded in his attempt; but this was not the confideration that induced him to defift ".

king John, that, with great fecrefy and much addrefs, he had negociated a league upon the continent for the deftruction of France, and, as it was perfectly well concerted, the confederates had proceeded to divide the bear's skin; Ferdinand, count of Handers was to have the city of Paris and the Ifle of France : the count of Bologne was to fhare the Vermandois; John himfelf to enjoy the provinces beyond the Loire ; and his nephew the emperor Otho was to poffefs Burgundy and Champagne *. Raymond count of Thouloufe, and the rest of the princes who had been fo ill treated by the croifade, had likewife promifed to make a diversion on their fide. Philip was no fooner acquainted with this confederacy than he turned all his forces against the count of Flanders, ravaged all the flat country, and laid fiege to Ghent; to facilitate the reduction of which, he ordered his fleet to repair to the port of Dam. He was quickly obliged to raife the fiege, by the news that the fquadrons of king john had taken three hundred of his flips, laden with all forts of ammunition and military ftores, funk a hundred more, and blocked up A.D. 1213. all the reft in the haven and canal y. They had likewife the boldnefs to land a fmall body of troops, which, marching directly towards the French camp, Philip furprifed and cut the best part of them to pieces; which trivial fuccefs could not confole him for the lofs he had already fuftained, and much lefs for that which followed; fince, having no other way to keep them out of the hands of the English, he was constrained to order all the rest of his fleet to be burnt. King John, animated by this little gleam of profperity, transported a confiderable army to Rochelle, where he no fooner landed, than the Poictivins revolted in his favour : he afterwards made himself mafter of Angiers, the fortifications of which had been demolified, and were by him repaired : in fine, he ravaged all the country as far as the frontiers of Bretagne 2. Philip, forefeeing the ill confequences that might attend this unexpected diversion, fent his fon Lewis with a confiderable force to oppose him. Some of the French historians fay, that, upon his approach, king John decamped fo precipitately, that he left his heavy baggage and engines of war behind him; but others affure us there were faults on both fides; that the Poictivins, afraid of being treated as rebels, abandoned the field, and that a great part of the French army, being feized with the like panic, behaved as ill : but, however this matter palled, it feems to be certain, that king John retired to his caffle at Partenai, refolved to wait there for the event of the campaign in Flanders, where the beft of his own troops were, and indeed the combined forces of the whole confederacy, under the command of the emperor in perfon *.

King Philip believing it more honourable, and not at all The immore dangerous, to meet than to expect his enemies, ad- portant vanced as far as Tournay, with an army of fifty thousand Bouvines, men, the flower of his forces, commanded by the principal nobility of France, fuch as Eudes duke of Burgundy, Robert count of Dreux, Philip his brother, Peter Courtenai count of Nevers, all princes of the blood ; Stephen count of Sancerre, John count of Ponthieu, Gaucher count of St. Paul; twenty-two other lords carrying banners, twelve hundred knights, and between fix and feven thoufand gens d'arms. The emperor Otho, on the other A D.1214. fide, had with him the earl of Salifbury, baftard brother to king John, Ferdinand count of Flanders, Rainald count of Bologne, Otho duke of Limburgh, William duke of Brabant, Henry duke of Lorrain, Philip count of Namur, feven or eight German princes, thirty bannerets, and an army fuperior in number to that of Philip. The two armies met near the village of Bouvines, on the 27th of July. The emperor laboured to outstretch the French line, giving the command of the right wing to the earl of Flanders, the left to the count of Bologne, and remained himfelf in the center, encircled by his great lords. The army of France was difpofed in order of battle by brother Guerin, of the order of the knights Hofpitallers, and bifhop elect of Senlis; and to the excellent difpolition he made contemporary writers afcribe the fortune of the day. The king was in the center, the duke of Burgundy commanded the right, and the count de St. Paul the left. The right was broke in the beginning of the action, but rallied and recovered their ground; the left fullained the attack of the allies, without giving way; but the heat of the battle was in the center, where the emperor was once taken, but refcued; Philip was wounded in the throat, dragged from his horfe, and in the fame inftant of time exposed to the most imminent danger of being cut to pieces, taken, or trampled to death, if the brave men who were about him had not delivered him. This engagement lafted from noon till about five o'clock, when the allies were totally routed, chiefly through the misfortune of having the fun all the time in their eyes, whereas the French had it on their backs. The counts of Flanders and Bologne, three other great counts, four German princes, and twenty-five bannerets, were taken prifoners. Philip returned to Paris, which he entered in triumph; the two counts of Flanders and Bologne following in chains*, He afterwards advanced towards Poitou, with an intent to crush John and his adherents; but upon the interpolition of the pope's legate, the fubmillion of John by Randal earl of Chefter, and a prefent of fixty thousand pounds sterling, he was prevailed upon to admit of a truce for five years ; for which he is exceedingly blamed by the modern French writers, who are amazed that he fhould lofe fo fair an opportunity of completing the re-union of all that John held in France. The character of this prince confidered, who was one of the best statefmen, and one of the most ambitious princes the French ever had, is fufficient to perfuade us, that he had his reafons for acting as he did, and a fufficient attention to certain facts that lie fcattered in the old writers, will enable us to diffinguifh what thefe motives were b. He was fenfible before the battle of Bouvines, that it was his own power rather than any regard for the king of England, that had raifed fo powerful a confederacy; he knew they had intelligence throughout his dominions, and even in his very camp; nay, he was fo fufpicious of fome about him, thar, when he heard divine fervice before the action began, he caufed a crown of gold to be placed upon the altar, and rold all the lords prefent, that, as they fought not for him, but for the honour and independency of France, if they knew any one amongst themselves more worthy to wear it, he was ready to place the crown upon his head, and to fight under his command; which generous proceeding extinguished all difaffection on that important day: but, after his return to Paris, he came to know fo diffinctly how diffatisfied the bulk of the nobility were at the increase of his power , that he thought it an improper juncture to augment it, and chofe rather to amafs money that might enable him to pay an army of his own, than to rifque his perfon any longer in one, where the troops of the crown bore but a fmall proportion to those of his vafials, whose army it was in effect more than his own.

The war being thus ended, the king fuffered his fon Lewis, Lewis to perform his vow, in marching with a body of heir aptroops against the Albigeois, who by this time were al- parent to troops against the Albigeois, who by this time were at Philip, is most entirely reduced; so that he rather infpired with invited by jealoufy Simon de Montfort, who commanded the crofies, the barous than did them any real fervice d. While he was thus cm- to receive ployed, a new occasion offered for gratifying his own and the crown his father's ambition ; the barons in England had taken up of England. arms against king John, and had declared him as a tyrant fallen from his regal dignity; but as he had a good army and fleet at his devotion, they found it not fo eafy to reduce him to the flate of a private man as they expected, and therefore they judged it expedient to fet up another king; with which view they invited prince Lewis, on the report, as they faid, of his virtues, to come and accept of the crown . The French hiftorians infift, or rather A.D.1115. dream, of a legal right, derived from his wife, who was the grand-daughter of Henry II. forgetting that, befides king John and his family, the princels Eleanor, fifter to Arthur, and daughter to Geoffrey, duke of Brctagne, was living : but election was a fufficient right for this purpofe; and therefore Lewis, in the flower of his age, and full of heat, readily accepted the offer. How to furnish him with forces for this purpole, was a point not eafy to be folved, even by king Philip f. It was likely to revive the jealoufy of his nobility; it was a direct breach of the truce, and it was a ftep that could not fail of provoking the pope. Philip, therefore, had recourfe to a very strange expedient; he difelaimed having any thing to do with his fon; he forbid him to meddle with the affairs of England; but furnished him, at the fame time, with a good army and a numerous fleet. This finefie was altogether A.D. 1216. ineffectual; for his nobility were not deceived; the truce was plainly violated; and the pope threatened an interdict. However, Lewis went to England, landed in Kent, took Rochefter, and other places, proceeded to London, and was received there as king ; but he committed a great error in leaving behind him Dover Caftle, which was very ill provided, and which king John immediately revictualled, and reinforced 8. nifbed him of his error, Lewis befieged the place, but without effect, as he did Windfor alfo with the fame want of fuccefs. While his forces were thus employed, John marched through the kingdom with his army, and took a fevere revenge of his enemies, ravaging their lands, and demolifhing their caftles, till furprifed by a fudden death b. In the mean time the pope had excommunicated both Lewis and Philip, and had commanded the bifhops of France to put the kingdom under an interdict; which, though they refused to do, upon the king's declaring he took no part in this war, yet he was fo much afraid of affifting his fon, that Lewis was conftrained to make a truce with the young king Henry III. that he might have time to pafs over into France, in order to obtain fuccours, without which he faw it was imposible to fupport his daily declining party i. It may be remarked, that at this time a minority proved of fingular advantage to England.

Eut, in the cloje is obliged to capiculate, and to quit the kingdom upon terms.

The terror of the papal power was at this time fo great, that king Philip refused to fee his fon, at least publicly, while he remained in France, and fo many precautions were used in furnishing him with supplies, that he received no great benefit from this voyage; while in England the defection became greater and greater, occafioned chiefly by a report, that the vifcount of Melun had declared upon his death-bed, that Lewis looked upon the barons as traitors, and refolved, as foon as it was in his power, to rid himfelf of them at any rate k. At his return Lewis attacked Dover again, with the fame ill fortune; and though his army afterwards reduced the city of Lincoln, yet, while they were engaged in the fiege of the caftle, they were furprifed and defeated by the earl of Pembroke, who, in this action, took no lefs than fiftytwo perfons of diffinction prifoners. This difafter fo much enfeebled the party of Lewis, that, in order to preferve the city of London, he was forced to fhut himfelf up there with all his forces 1. In this diffrefs he redoubled his applications to his father for relicf. Philip, not daring to ailift him in any other way, recommended him to the care of his confort Blanch, who very fpeedily raifed a body of troops, under the command of Robert de Courtenai, and embarked them on board a ftrong fquadron, commanded by Eustace le Moine : but the English fleet attacked them at the mouth of the river Thames, and, having taken the admiral, caufed his head to be ftruck off, becaufe he had been formerly in the English fervice; an execution which fo intimidated the reft, that, crowding all their fail, they returned into the French harbour. This retreat left Lewis no other means of faving himfelf than by a treaty, which he made in perfon with the young king Henry, the legate, and the earl of Pembroke : the terms were, that Lewis and the lords with him fhould take an oath to fland to the judgment of the church; to return quietly into France; to use their endeavours to procure the reflitution of Normandy, and the reft of the countries poffeffed by king Philip; and, in cafe they fhould not fucceed, to reftore them whenever Lewis became king m. On the other hand, the barons were reftored to all their liberties and privileges, and the prifoners taken in the battle of Lincoln. and at the rout of the French fleet, were to be fet free. The legate, upon the execution of this treaty, abfolved prince Lewis; who returned to France, where he was again abfolved by the pope's legate with much ceremony".

By this time, the cruelty of the croffes, under the command of Simon de Montfort, had fo wore out the patience of the people in the fouth of France, that they had reftored the old count of 'Thouloufe, and Simon, belieging him in that city, was killed before it; upon which pope Honorius III. earneftly folicited king Philip to fend Lewis once more against the Albigeois, and the monks were ordered to preach again the croifade P. The king, after much intreaty, confented; Lewis took the command of the army, but made no great progrefs, either through want of zeal in himfelf, or in virtue of fecret inftructions from his father; who at length, in tendernefs to his reputation, thought fit to recall him 9.

The principal motive to the recalling prince Lewis was The death to have him prefent at a great council of the nobility of Philip Auguflus.

and prelates, which was to be held at Paris, to confider of the offer made by Amauri de Montfort, the eldeft fon of Simon; who, furmifing that Lewis had carried on the war against the Albigeois fo coldly because the crown had no immediate interest in it, proposed, out of his zeal against the heretics, to refign to the crown his rights to the duchy of Narbonne, the county of Thouloufe, and all the lands that had been fo liberally beftowed upon his father by pope Innocent the Third in the council of Lateran. The king alfo returning out of his new conquest for the fame purpofe, fell ill of a fever at Mante, where he died, A.D. 1223. on the 14th of July, in the forty-fourth year of his reign, and the fifty-ninth of his age ". Philip is allowed to have been the greatest monarch that reigned in France from the time of Charlemagne, and that very defervedly, in whatever light he is confidered. As a politician, he did more towards reftoring the authority of the crown than all his predeceffors, and indeed as much as could be expected; for at the time of his demife the balance between the crown and its vaffals was destroyed, and the great check of the English power removed. As a captain, he was the first who introduced regular troops in his own pay; who reduced war to a fystem; encouraged the invention of military engines; and introduced a regular method of defending and belieging towns. As the patron of letters he revived and augmented the privileges of the univerfity of Paris'; laid the foundations of the caffle of the Louvre; caufed most of the great towns in his dominions to be walled and paved; and, in the latter end of his life, expended the immense treasure he had amaffed in making great roads, building bridges, and in conftructing other edifices for public ufe; works which fhew that his laying up money did not arife from a fpirit of avarice, but from a view to public utility, otherwife he would never have parted with it, more effectially in his old age. But that for which he is most celebrated by the French hiftorians, is, the reuniting to the crown Normandy, Anjou, Maine, Touraine, Poitou, Auvergne, Vermandois, Artois, Montargis, and Guienne; fo that he left the kingdom of France twice as large as he received it,

(G) This famous monarch was of a middle stature, well proportioned, had regular features; but the misfortune to have two fpecks on one of his eyes. He was affable and eafy in his manners, and had the general good of his fubjects at heart. His first queen was Ifabel, daughter of Baldwin the Brave, count of Hainault, whom he espoused the 28th of April, 1180. Three years after, he banished her to Senlis, for having fpoke to him a little too warmly in behalf of the cardinal of Rheims. She died at Paris, March 15th, 1100, in the 21st year of her age, in child-bed of twins, leaving behind her only one fon Lewis, who fucceeded his father. He espouled at Amiens, Aug. 12th, 1193, Isemburge, or Ingelburge, fifter to Canute the Sixth, king of Denmark, whom he repudiated, and procured a divorce, as we have fhewn in the text, under pretence of confanguinity. In June, 1196, he married Agnes, the daughter of Bertold the Fourth, duke of Merania, whom many historians call Mary. She died at Poiffi, in 1201, of grief, at his being obliged by the pope to take back his former queen. By her he had Philip Hurfpel, that is, the Rude, created by his father count of Clermont in Beauvoifis, but who, in right of his wife Matilda, or Maud, became count of Dammartin and Bologne, and gave great difturbance to the queen-regent in the minority of St. Lewis. He had also by the fame princefs a daughter Mary, in 1206 the espoused Philip, count of Namur, and, after his decease, Henry, duke of Brabant. Notwithstanding the king, to prevent an interdict, took back queen Ingelburge, and was feemingly reconciled, yet he very foon after fent her to Eftampes, where file remained twelve years, and then, when it was least expected, he fent for her to Paris, lived with her the remaining ten years of his life in great tranquillity, and, befides her jointure, left her, by will. ten thousand livres, as a mark of his affection.

fwered roundly, that he effcemed his title to the forfeited dominions, which his father united to the crown, as incontestible; and that, with respect to his own treaty, he looked upon it to be void, becaufe he was informed the English barons were not reftored to all their privileges, and that the French prifoners had been obliged to pay ranfom ". As it was pretty evident a war would enfue as foon as the truce expired, the king renewed his treaty with the emperor Frederick, and foon after made another with Hughes count de March, who had married the queendowager of England. These precautions being taken. Lewis refolved to profecute his father's defign, which was the total expulsion of the English : he raifed for this purpofe a numerous army, with which he belieged Niort: the place was defended by Savari de Mauleon, who had Litherto been the chief fupport of the English interest in Poitou. He made a gallant desence, but was at length cbliged to capitulate, and retire with his garrifon to Rochelle. Lewis next made himfelf mafter of St. John d'Angeli, and afterwards marched his victorious army to beliege Rochelle. Savari, who had the reputation of being one of the greateft captains of that age, behaved in a manner fuitable to that character, and folicited continually relief from England, more efpecially in money; but, being deluded with fallacious promifes, and a quarrel arifing between the garrifon and the inhabitants, he was obliged to capitulate, and was permitted to embark with his garrifon for England; where, looking upon himfelf as very ill treated, he returned into France, and entered into the fervice of king Lewis *. All that the English now possefied was the city of Bourdeaux, and the country beyond the Garonne. To preferve this, Henry fent a ftout fquadron, with a confiderable corps of troops on board, commanded by his brother Richard, whom he made a knight, and created earl of Cornwall and count of Poi-A D.1224. touy. This measure had an extraordinary effect, the nobility, clergy, and people, naturally inclined to the Englifh, were fo pleafed to have a prince of the royal blood amongft them, that they enabled him to make fuch efforts as induced king Lewis to make a truce for three years; for which he is, by fome writers, very much blamed 2.

The apparent motive of the king's conduct was his be-

Aviguan. While he was preparing for this expedition a very extraordi-nary affair happened. There appeared in Flonders a man who flyled himfelf Baldwin emperor of Conftantinople, confequently the natural fovereign of that country, and as fuch he was joyfully received by the people<sup>2</sup>. The countefs, who had governed from the time of her hufband Ferdinand's imprifonment, finding it impoffible to refift, had recourfe to the protection of king Lewis; who fummoned this emperor Baldwin to attend him at Peronne. The man went thither with great intropidity; related the manner in which he had fallen into the hands of the Bulgarians; the great hardfhips he had endured in his captivity; and the way by which he made his efcape : but when they queftioned him as to things that had paffed before he left Flanders, he answered fullenly, that he would fay nothing before fuch a multitude. Upon this refufal, the king difmiffed him, but with a fafe conduct, till he was out of his dominions. The people now abandoned him, and he was feized by fome adherents of the countefs, who caufed him to be tortured to death as an impostor, an affertion which did not hinder her fubjects from reproaching her with her ambition and avarice, that had infligated her to treat in this manner a perfon fhe knew to be her father b. After this transaction, the king having affembled his army, and the cardinal legate having paved the way, by thundering out an excommunication against the young count of Thouloufe, marched directly to Lyons, and from thence, along the banks of the Rhone, to Avignon; where the people would have fubmitted, but that they were afraid of being plundered. The king refufing to give them any affurance to the contrary, they flut their gates, and he immediately invefted the place with an army of fifty thousand men. As the people were driven to defpair, they made a very A.D. 1216. long and obstinate defence, till at length the king, who had with him the principal nobility of France, forced them to yield to a capitulation ; but found his army fo much dirainished, and in fo miferable a condition, that he was confirained to defer the fiege of Thouloufe, which he had likewife meditated, to the next year. Retiring into Auvergne, in his paffage from thence to Paris he was feized with a violent diffemper, of which he died in a week at Montpenfier, in the thirty-ninth year of his age, and fourth of his reign. Some writers fay, that his physicians thought he might have recovered, if he would have taken a woman to his bed; but that he chose rather to die than to commit a mortal fin . He is thought to have forefeen the troubles that happened upon his death, by his requiring the oaths of the prelates and nobility that were about him, that they would place the crown upon his fon's head; and though it is faid, that he took this promife under their hands and feals, yet they were not very forward to obferve it d, having long expected fuch an opportunity of fetting up what they effeemed their own rights against those of the crown.

Lewis IX. afterwards flyted St. Lewis, fucceeds his father, under the tutelage of guesu Elanch.

Lewis the Ninth, commonly called St. Lewis, was about twelve years of age when his father died. Some of the prelates, who were near the perfon of that monarch. having deposed, that he declared his confort tutorefs and regent, the queen-dowager immediately took upon her the title and power, affembled forces, and refolved to carry her fon to Rheims, though the fee was then vacant, in order to be crowned. Authors fpeak very differently of this princefs; for fome make her a miracle of beauty and piety; others affert, that the was rather agreeable than handfome, and that, if the had her virtues, the had her weakneffes alfo . That fhe was beloved by Thibaut count of Champagne was the common rumour of that age, grounded upon the fougs and poems written by him in her praife. In anfwer to the objection, that her lover was one of the first who declared himfelf a malecontent, it is faid, that he did this from jealoufy, the queen being wholly directed by the advice of the cardinal legate, who was fufpected to love the queen, and who it was alfo fufpected was not hated by her f. But it is very probable thefe are but calumnies, fince Blanch was at this time towards forty, and the count of Champagne little more than half as old; fo that his paffion was to be regarded rather as vanity, with which the queen ought to have been offended, and fo at first it feems the was, fince the gave express directions for arrefting him, in cafe he had come to Rheims; but afterwards her affairs taught her to make another use of his folly, which, as we shall fee, her fon knew how to chastife. In the mean time, perceiving the difaffection of the nobility, fhe caufed her fon to be crowned by the bifhop of Soiffons, though there were only three counts, the great officers of the crown, and a few prelates, prefent at that ceremony; which was one of the wifelt fteps fhe could take 5.

The great lords, perceiving how much their power had The confebeen leffened, and their authority reftrained, by the two deracy alast kings, thought this minority, which was the third gaingt the from the death of Hugh Capet, a favourable opportunity queen-reto recover both; and therefore they made certain de- gent, and mands, which they infifted fhould be granted before matives of they rendered homage to the new king. The chiefs of those who this confederacy were, Philip, count of Bologne, the fon composed it. of Philip Augustus, who was sufpected to have a defign upon the crown; Joanna, countefs of Flanders, who bore an irreconcileable hatred to the queen-regent; Peter de Dreux, fecond fon to Robert count of Dreux, and grandfon of Robert, fourth fon to Lewis the Grofs, who, by the marriage of Conftance, the daughter of the heirefs of Bretagne by Guy de Thours, held that country with the title of count, and who was very defirous of rendering himfelf independent of the crown; Thibaut, count of Champagne, out of vanity and pique; Raymond, count of Thouloufe, in hopes of recovering and fccuring his dominions; Berenger, count of Provence; from the ftrict alliance he had long held with Raymond. The points upon which they infifted, were, that as the queen was a ftranger, the ought to give them fome fecurity that the would not violate the laws; that fhe fhould reftore the eftates of fuch as had been confifeated during the laft reigns; and that fhe fhould feleafe fuch as were prifoners, particularly Ferdinand, count of Flanders; all whicle demands fhe peremptorily refufed b. In order to fecure herfelf, and to make them fenfible of her refentment, fhe marched immediately with an army against the count of Champagne, having with her the count de Bologne, who had not as yet declared for the malecontents. Some writers fay, that the compelled Thibaut to pay homage to the king, and to acknowlege his indiferetion; but others allege, that the only fignified to him that the had a mind to fee him at court, and that thereupon he quitted his party, and went to throw himfelf at her feet. There is certainly the greater probability of this from her conduct towards the reft; for having twice fummoned them to answer before the parliament, the at length condescended to treat with them all, and by a proper diffribution of favours to them, and of money to their favourites, drew them gradually to fubmifion. In one inflance the thewed great dexterity: the countefs of Flanders, whom the populace reproached with the murder of her father, and who, by pretending the could not raife his ranfom, had left her hufband Ferdinand fo many years in prifon, was now inclined to get that marriage diffolved, with a view of marrying the count of Bretagne. To prevent this match, the queen fet count Ferdinand at liberty, upon fuch eafy terms, that he remained ever after attached to her fervice. It is alfo faid that the prevented Henry III. of England from coming to the affiftance of the malecontents, by attacking the weak fide of his minister, the great earl of Kent, who, with many heroic qualities, loved money too much, and for a large fum fuffered the expedition to fail for want of a fleet i. Yet, when the thought all quiet, the found herfelf in the greateft danger.

Is revived when is appeared to be diffipated.

The old count of Bologne, who was taken at the battle of Bouvines, had been all this time in prifon; and finding he was to remain there, when the count of Flanders was discharged, freed himfelf, in a fit of despair, from life and chains together. The king's uncle, Philip, who had been reftrained by the fear of the queen's fetting his father-in-law at liberty, now joined the malecontents. 'I heir first scheme was to feize the person of the king in his paffage from Orleans to Paris; but the queen, being informed of this by the count of Champagne, carried the king to a flrong fortrefs upon the road, and having given notice of his danger to the people of Paris, they came with a force fufficient to conduct him in fafety to his capital k. This difappointment, though it difconcerted, did not diffolve the confederacy, except in appearance; for having taken their meafures with the count of Bretagne, they feparated, as if they had given all for loft. The count of Bretagne broke out into open rebellion; and the king having named the place of rendezvous on the frontiers, all the malecontents, with high profeffions of loyalty, promiled to repair thither. They did fo, but with fo flender a force, that the count might eafily have made the king prifoner, which was what they defigned : but the count of Champagne, whom they had trufted in this as in the former plot, arrived, when they leaft expected it, with fo great a force, that the count de Bretagne, inflead of triumphing, was forced to fubmit, and make the beft terms with the king and queen-regent that he could obtain 1. The queen having, by the affiftance of the cardinal legate, drawn an immenfe fubfidy from the clergy in France, affifted the army of the church fo powerfully, that the count of Thouloufe, being reduced to extremity, made a peace on the hardest terms. He confented to give his daughter to the king's brother Alonfo, and declare her fole heirefs of his eftates, by which means they were afterwards annexed to the crown m.

In the mean time the malecontents had drawn the count They atof Champagne back to their party, by offering to him the tack the daughter of the count of Bretagne; yet the king, being Chaminformed of this intended match, broke it by a letter fent pagne. to the count, when all things were prepared for its celebration; a circumftance which fo incenfed the malecontents, that they fent for the queen of Cyprus, who had a claim to this country, and on her behalf entered Champagne with an army. This invafion occafioned the revolt of a great part of the count's vallals; but the king came to his relief with a powerful army, and obliged his enemies to retire. At length the claim of the queen of Cyprus was compromifed for a fum of money, which the king advanced by the fale of a confiderable part of the AD, 1222. count's territories; fo that, upon the whole, the crown was the greatest gainer in this transaction ".

In the course of her regency the queen gave repeated proofs of her firmuels and addrefs. She made use of the Blanch's earl of Flanders to curb the count of Bologne when in regency no arms; and, at length, the totally detached him from the prejudice u party of the malecontents, by convincing him he was deceived by them; and that, while they affected to flatter him with hopes of the crown, they in reality defigned it for Enguerrand de Coucy, a nobleman of great merit and parts, but weak enough to believe that they were fincere in

In fhort, fhe applied the money The received from the clergy fo prudently, that very often those who appeared to be the most zealous amongst the malecontents were but her fpies; and if there were any who refused her money, the gave it out politively that they had accepted it; fo that they were in continual difputes and jealoufies of each other P. As for the count of Bretagne, he could do nothing without the king of England's affistance. The queen's liberalities were to acceptable to his minifters, that fometimes fhe hindered him from fuccouring the count, and rendered his expeditions fruitlefs when he did; fo that, after taking one of the count's principal fortreffes, in a manner under the king's eve. the forced the former to fubmit, and the latter to confent to a truce for three years : thus the troubles of her regency were ended, without the least prejudice to the king's authority or domain 9.

After all, the was far from efcaping centure, and the great pains the took about the king's education was made the fubiect. Those to whom the entrusted it were chiefly clergy, who took more pains to imprefs on his mind fentiments of religion than politics. The courtiers, who were by no means pleafed, published very different stories, fome deplored the fate of the kingdom, the monarch of which was like to have no other abilities than those of a monk; while others whifpered, that the young king could diffemble as well as his mother, and that, notwithstanding his modeft appearance, he had privately his miftreffes, with which circumflance the regent was not unacquainted, but that the was willing he fhould indulge other paffions while the indulged her ambition . The queen, to prevent their rendering that a truth, which was at prefent a calumny, refolved to marry the young king, in his nineteenth year, to Margaret, the eldeft daughter of the count of Provence. That project being executed without difficulty or delay, the kept the young king, and his younger wife, fo much under her eye , and in fuch awe, as furnished materials for fresh stories, which, though not altogether groundlefs, fhe treated with contempt, and continued to take her measures according to her own fense

When, therefore, the king approached the frontiers with an army, the count, who had done homage to the king of England for his territories, defired leave to demand fuccour from that monarch, which, if he did not receive, he promifed to fubmit. This was indulged him, and Henry refuting to come with a fleet and army to relieve him, he returned, and prefented himfelf before Lewis with a rope about his neck. The king, however, after A.D. 1234. fome hard words, and the impolition of very rigorous terms, difmiffed him, fufficiently humbled, and yet glad to efcape even at that rate t. Lewis having attained the age of twenty-one years, might, as the conflication of France then flood, have taken the reins of government into his own hands; but queen Blanch was not weary of ruling; and the king had fo much deference for his mother, that though the laid afide the title of regent, the exercifed the fame authority as before. Thibaut, count of Champagne, being become, in right of his mother, king of Navarre, and having found an immense fum in the treasury of that crown, began to furmife, that it was not a fale, but a mortgage he had made of the effates which fome years before he had furrendered to the crown. But the king, notwithstanding the interpolition of the pope, made him fo fenfible of the fuperior weight of his arms, that he was constrained to fubmit ". The manner in which these potent vaffals of the crown had been from time to time mortified, and the fenfe they had of the impoffibility of giving the crown any remarkable difquiet at this juncture, induced them to follow the example of the king of Navarre, who had taken the crofs, that they might go and difplay their courage and their power, at the fame time that they indulged their fpirit of independency in diftant climates. Accordingly the count de Bretagne, having refigned his dominions to his fon Henry count of Bar, the duke of Burgundy, with Amauri de Montfort, conttable of France, and feveral other great lords attended him ". About this time it is faid, that the prince of the Affaffins detached two of his defperate attendants into France, with orders to kill the king; but being afterwards informed how mild and good a prince he was, fent a countermand, and those who brought it arrived before the Affaffins. The king, apprifed by them of his danger, inflituted, as his grandfather had done, a new guard, with maces, for A.D. 1238. the fecurity of his perfon. In a little time the two Affaffins were discovered and feized ; but the king was fo far from doing them any huit, that he caufed them to be kindly treated, and fent them back with a rich prefent for their mafter. Perhaps it was not the good character of the king folely that brought about this event : the Tartars began like an inundation to fweep all Afia; and the prince of the Affaffins, and other Mohammedan powers, most earnestly implored the affistance of the Christians to prevent their common deflruction by thefe barbarous invaders *.

> So long as the great lords remained abroad, the kingdom enjoyed tranquility. Lewis, as foon as he became of age, had fettled his brothers in the manner prefcribed by his father's teftament, and omitted nothing that could contribute to place them in a flate of grandeur and fecurity fuitable to their birth. This conduct chagrined fome and frighted others, and therefore, upon the return of the count of Bretagne, and other lords, from Syria, they began to cabal afreth, and to take all the measures they could devife for exciting a new civil war y. At the head of this contrivance was the count de la March, who had married the queen-dowager of England, a princels who could not bear the thoughts of doing homage to the children of queen Blanch, and who was bent, at all events, to recover for her fon Henry the territories his father had loft in France. The count of Thouloufe was also of this faction, and with much more reafon than any, fince he had been very hardly treated. Henry III. of England was the power chiefly depended upon, and, indeed, but for that dependence, there could have been none of these disturbances in France 2.

New intrigues, in hopes of fupport from Henry III. of England.

This by fetter went but a little way in a war where his allies were very ity on a hungry, and where, though they were to reap all the pro- folid founfit, they notwithflanding expected him to be at most of. dation. the expence*. King Lewis, after trying all means to quiet the minds of the malecontents, at length affembled a great army, the beft part of which was composed of troops in his own pay. Having twice defeated the confederates, he confirained the count of La March to make a feparate peace upon very hard terms, and concluded another truce with Henry, who finding himfelf difappointed by the greater part of the French lords, began to have a diftafte for these kind of proceedings, and therefore went to Bourdeaux, to get his fon Edward acknowleged by the inhabitants of that city for his heir apparent b. The tri- A.D.1242. umphing over this confederacy, which, if things had taken another turn, would have produced an univerfal infurrection, was the most important, if not the most glorious event in the reign of king Lewis, as it placed his authority on a level, at least with that of his grandfather Philip Augustus .

The count of Thouloufe was the laft who fubmitted ; Measures and though the king readily pardoned his revolt, yet he taken by was very îlrict in the precautions he took, that he fhould him for not revolt again. It is whole conduct was of the fame  $po[e_i$  and tenure; and the point he kept continually in view was, to his caution put it out of the power of the great lores to difturb him in regard with impunity. He had before made an edict, with the 10 the pope. confent of his parliament or council, that they fhould not marry their daughters to foreigners without his permiflion; the pretence was to prevent flrangers from inheriting lands in France, to the prejudice of the natives, which was very plaufible and popular; but the principal aim was to hinder their having any connections, and of confequence obtaining any fupport from other princes d. At this time he made another edict, that fuch as held lands from him and from the king of England, fhould make their election to which of the kings they would render homage, and thereby put an end to the old cuftom of becoming fubjects to both kings, and adhering, either as their humours or their interests led them, to which they pleafed. This ordinance was confidered as a great hardfhip, fince, by making their option, these vaffals were fure to lose their eftates either in one country or the other. 'To redrefs this evil as far it could be redreffed. Lewis indemnified those who adhered to him out of the lands of those who chofe to do homage to the king of England . Pope Innocent IV. being driven out of Italy, was defirous of putting himfelf under the protection of France, which the king declined granting, as forefeeing many inconveniences that would attend it, but permitted him to hold a council at Lyons, which was not then united to the crown, in which the emperor Frederick was excommunicated. The king foon after fell fick of a grieyous diftemper, in which he remained for the fpace of twenty-four hours fo totally infenfible, that many believed him dead. Upon his coming to himfelf he immediately took the crofs from the hands of the bifhop of Paris, making at the fame time a A.D.1244, folemn vow to go in perfon with an army against the infidels, which threw the nation into almost as great perplexity as that from which they recovered on the first news of his being out of danger f. The wifeft and ableft of his ministers laboured to disfuade him from this refolution; but their efforts were to no purpose, though he readily agreed to do nothing precipitately, but to take all the precautions poffible to prevent this expedition from being fo prejudicial to his dominions as those of his predeceffors had been.

Refolves to make an expedition into the Eaft, but provides jor it with extreme caution.

He judgeditneceffary to have the confent of the nobility before he undertook this expedition; and as the obtaining this was no very eafy matter, confidering their general reluctance, and the little hope there was of fuecefs abroad, or of tranquility at home, if he went unattended by the moft powerful of his vaffals, he was obliged to act with the unnoft caution. From the addrefs he fhewed in the management of his affairs, we may very fafely pronounce, that never was fo imprudent a defign fo prudently conducted. He had an interview with the pope, in hopes of reconciling him to the emperor Frederick, but without effect. However, though he miffed of doing another's bufinefs in this journey, he executed his own, by procuring for his brother Charles, Beatrix, the youngeft daughter of the count of Provence, to whom, in prejudice of his other daughters, and particularly the queen of France, her father had bequeathed his dominions ". The fecrefy and art with which this bufinefs was managed, though fo many great princes, and particularly the king of England, married to another daughter of the count's, employed all their skill and interest to prevent it, did him great credit. He was no lefs fuccefsful in levying a tenth of their revenues upon his clergy, by the authority of the pope; but when the pontiff would have extracted another fum for carrying on his war against the emperor, Lewis interfered in hehalf of the clergy, who were thus reconciled to his expedition h. The many different methods he practifed, and the earneftnefs he flewed, in exhorting the nobility to follow his example, had by degrees a great effect, more efpecially after he had prevailed upon the count of March, and the old count of Bretagne, the two most turbulent men in France, to affume the crofs<sup>i</sup>. His greateft difficulty was about the king of England; for having, according to the cuftom of those times, upon all fuch occasions, made open proclamation, that if there was any perfon he had wronged he was ready to do them right, and to make reftitution to all who had a right to claim it; Henry fent over his brother earl Richard, who very boldly and plainly told the king, that he ought to reftore to his brother Normandy, and the reft of the countries of which he had been defpoiled, in cafe he hoped for fuccefs against the infidels k. The king had fo far regard to his application, that he fub- A.D 1247. mitted this as a cafe of confcience to the bifhops of Normandy, and, upon their declaring he was not bound to · make reftitution, he declined it. Henry confented, neverthelefs, to the renewing the truce; and the king, having declared the queen-mother regent in his abfence, disposed every thing for his departure.

He carried with him in this expedition his queen, and The army his two brothers Robert and Charles. At Lyons he received the benediction of the pope; then paffing down the Rhone, he embarked at Aigues Mortes on the 23d of August, and, having fair winds and a fine passage, landed lands there his forces on the 25th of September following in the ifle of Cyprus, where he refolved to winter 1. winters in Cyprus, reimbarks for Egypt, and without opfalem and the Holy Land, when conquered, could never be kept, while Fgypt remained in the hands of the infidels. Here alfo he received ambaffadors from Arroenia, and from the khân of the Tartars, the latter affuring him that he would find full employment for the foltan of Bagdat, and the former promifing to make a diverfion againlt the foltan of Iconium<sup>m</sup>. In the fpring, having received a confiderable reinforcement under the command of Roberr, duke of Burgundy, he difpofed every thing for his fecond embarkation. It was, however, about the middle of May before his fleet, which confifted of eighteen hundred fail, departed from Cyprus; but meeting with a tempefl in their paffage, it is faid he had not a third, fome affirm not a paffage, it is faid he had not a third, fome affirm not a fourth part of his forces, at the time of his landing. This diminution however, produced no ill confequence; for though the enemy had twenty thoufand men well pofted to hinder his landing, yet they were ftruck with fuch a panic at the fight of his troops leaping on fhore, that after one difcharge of their arrows, they retired in the utmoft confusion, and abundoned the city of Damieta, a place rich, of great extent, and extremely well fortified ".

Alvances towards Cairo, is Jurrounded, bea'en, and at length taken pri-Joner by the tunidels.

The first fuccels feemed to promife great things, with which, however, the following events did by no means correspond. They took peffection of this place in the beginning of the month of June, and the ribng of the waters of the Nile rendering it impoffible to proceed to Cairo, they were obliged to flay feveral months where they were. Lewis confidering the importance of Damieta, preferved with great care the magazines and military flores that were found therein; and this conduct difpleafed the bulk of his army exceedingly, who afferted, that, according to the cuftom of the croffes, he had a right only to a third part of the plunder°. They flewed from this time but little recard to his orders; for, composed as they were of different nations, many of them perfons of high quality, and all volunteers, discipline could arise only from a fense of duty. Instead therefore of providing for the next campaign, they thought of nothing but feafts, flows, and debauchery. When the feason for action returned, after rejecting an offer made them by the foltan of reftoring Jerufalem, and all the places the Christians had once poffeffed, and refolving to liften to no propolitions whatever, they marched, as to a certain victory, against the infidels . A canal of the Nile lay in their paffage ; they were equally unprovided with boats or bridges; this, deficiency put them upon attempting to run a cauleway, with infinite labour, acrois it, and with little fucces; at length they found by chance a ford, which the count d'Artois, the king's brother, paffed with two thousand horse, but inftead of entrenching on the other fide, after having difperfed a corps of the enemy, he pushed on to Massoura, and, finding the place open, began to plunder. The infidels, perceiving that he was unfupported, barricadoed themfelves in their houfes, and from thence threw wildfire, ftones, boiling water, and whatever elfe came to hand, upon the affailants; the troops too, whom they had difperfed, rallied and invefted the place, fo that, furrounded by enemies on every fide, the count d'Artois, and the best part of his detachment, perished P. The reft of the Chriftian army, however, paffed the canal, and with great courage, though in great diforder, attacked the enemy, and gained fome advantages, but were at length obliged to post themselves in a strong camp, where they fuffered exceedingly from the fcarcity of provision, the fcurvy, dyfentery, and other difeafes, being clofely blocked up by the fuperior enemy. The king might have A.D. 1250 made his escaped by fea, but he refolved to share with his forces the danger of a retreat, which was undertaken when there was fcarce a poffibility of fucceeding. In their march they were continually attacked by the infidels; and at length, on the 5th of April, being entirely broken, the king and his brother were taken prifoners, with the poor remains of their army 9.

The infidels made a most infolent and barbarous use of Lewis their victory; they used their prisoners cruelly; they took bears this every method poffible of fhewing their abhorrence and con- mifortune with great tempt of the Christian religion ; they infulted the king per- fortitude, fonally, they threatened him with fetters, and even with notwithtortures. In all probability they would have proceeded Manding farther, if the precaution he had taken of preferving the extreme ill magazines and military ftores in Damieta, repairing its fortifications, and leaving in it a ftrong garrifon, for the fecurity of the queen, and other ladies, had not put it out of the power of the infidels to carry that place by affault r.

When,

When, therefore, they faw the war was not at an end, and apprehended the Chriftians might fend another army into Egypt if they continued in poffellion of this fortrefs, they began to alter their measures : but, to understand this matter clearly, we must of necessity observe, that, during the progrefs of this war, great alterations had happened amongst the Mamalukes, who were then in possession of Egypt'. Their foltan, at the time king Lewis landed and made himfelf mafter of Damieta, was Al Malec Al Salehi, who died of a mortification in his thigh before the opening of the next campaign; his fon and fucceffor being at a diftance, the army was commanded by Phachro'ddin Othman; but, before the laft engagement, the young foltan Al Malec Al Moadhemi was come to the army. His favourites having observed to him, that he was a king only in name, and that the power was in the old foltana Shajro'l Dorra, and a few of the emirs who were in her confidence, they advifed him to treat with the monarch of the Franks, that, by recovering Damieta, and putting an end to the war, he might establish his own power '.

He, yielding to their perfuafions, entered into a negotiation with Lewis, and agreed, that he flould furrender the Infidels, Damieta in confideration of his own liberty, and pay a million of pieces of gold for the ranfom of the other prifoners; to which terms it was added, that there fhould be peace between the Christians and the Mohammedans in Syria, as well as in Egypt, for ten years. This negotiation being on the point of taking effect, Shajro'l Dorra, and the principal emirs, having intelligence of what was intended, engaged part of the army to revolt, and murdered the unfortunate Al Malec Al Moadhemi under the very eyes of his royal prifoner, who, with thefe about him, was very near fharing the fame fate ". However, when things were a little fettled, these great lords, and Phares Aktai, whom they raifed to the rank of foltan, ratified the treaty, which was performed with great punctuality. Lewis, understanding that they were deceived in . the tale of the money, and had received a confiderable fum fhort, he was fo far from availing himfelf of the fraud, that he caufed it immediately to be made good ", though in order to do it he was obliged to borrow the mo-

Damieta being evacuated by his troops, the king, with his queen and his two brothers, and about fix thousand men, which was effcemed about a fixth part of the forces he brought into Egypt, embarked on board the gallies of the Genoefe, and were fafely transported to the port of Acon in Syria *; all hopes of making any impression in Egypt being loft.

To these remonstrances the king opposed his duty as a Chriftian monarch, the honour of performing fomething worthy of his rank and dignity in fuch an expedition, and the broken condition of the Chriftian principalities in those parts. He added, that the prudence of the queen-mother's conduct, and the courage of the barons, relieved him from all apprehenfions as to the interruption of domeftic-quiet, or the confequence of an invation from England. In this hope, however, he was a little too fanguine, for the news of his imprifonment had thrown his hereditary dominions into great confusion, and, together with other afflictions, had fo wrought upon the health and fpirits of queen Blanch, that little of her former conduct appeared in her administration y. She had fuffered an apostate monk, who was afterwards fufpected to act as a fpy for the foltan of Egypt, to preach a new kind of croifade for the deliverance of the king out of captivity, by which means he affembled near one hundred thoufand people of low rank, to whom he gave the appellation of Shepherds. force them, they demanded contributions, which ended A.D.1252, in a civil war; in the course of which they were partly difperfed, and partly extirpated z. This commotion, with the remorfe of having executed two perfons as fpreaders of falfe news, who first reported the king was made prifoner in Egypt, affected the queen-regent to fuch a degree, that it broke her heart. She took, a little before her death, the habit of a religious order, and was buried in a monaftery of her own foundation, with all the demonftrations of profound forrow and fincere effeem, that the nobility, clergy, and people could give. This melancholy event had a very untoward effect on the affairs of France, and obliged those, upon whom the administration devolved, to fend the most prefling remonstrances to the king to return, without farther delay ª.

Uton the death of queen Blanch, takes a refolution of returning intoFrance.

The king received the news of his mother's death with the most fensible regret : but his confort queen Margaret was very eafily confoled, for the old queen had kept her fo much under, that the was not difpleafed to be free from her restraint. Lewis, convinced by the reasons affigned in the remonstrance before mentioned, determined to return ; but he executed this refolution with great deliberation. He left all the places the Christians still held in Syria in a proper flate of defence; he placed in them garrifons of his own troops, and dillributed his money freely. by which means he acquired very justly the title of the Father of the Christians b. Thefe precautions being taken, he embarked at Acon on the 24th of April, with a fquadron of fourteen fail. He took the island of Cyprus in his route, and was in great danger upon those coafts; arrived A.D.1254, in his own dominions about the middle of July, and made his entry into Paris in the beginning of the month of September. He ftill wore the crofs on his upper garment, appeared grave, or rather difconfolate ; obferved great regularity in his court; but affected in his drefs and manners rather the plainnels of a private man, than the flate of a great prince . Thibaut II. king of Navarre, and count of Champagne and Brie, having demanded his daughter lfabel in marriage, he readily confented to the match, after having fettled the difpute between him and the counters of Bretagne. fit, and was received with great pomp at Paris, where Beatrix, countefs-dowager of Provence, had the fingular felicity of embracing her four daughters, the queens of France and England, and the counteffes of Anjou and Cornwall<sup>d</sup>. Henry entertained the king with great fplendour at the Temple, where he took up his lodgings, and where Lewis would have yielded him the place of honour. if he had not abfolutely refuted it; the king likewife entertained him very fumptuoufly, and, when he would have retired in the evening, told him he was mafter in his own houfe, and he was refolved to have him one night in his power. He was fo well pleafed with Henry's franknefs and condefcention, that he could not help faying at fupper, " I would willingly reftore you Normandy, and all your dominions, but that is a thing to which the twelve peers and barons of my kingdom will never confent." After a week's stay, Henry fet out for Boulogne, and Lewis accompanied him the first day's journey. The truce was foon after renewed between the two crowns.

The king laboured with inceffant diligence to correct abules, to pacify disputes of every kind, and to promote himself peace throughout his kingdom; for which good purpoles he fometimes took very fingular methods : as for inftance, regulate all when the countefs-dowager of Provence, the queen's mo- things in ther, and the count of Anjou, his own brother, confented his realm to abide by his decision, in respect to certain castles which they both claimed, he decreed that the count thould purchafe them, and at the fame time gave him the money . his ab-He was no lefs defirous of terminating whatever difputes fence. fubfifted with his neighbours. With this view he concluded a treaty with the king of Arragon, and not long after with Henry III. of England, to whom he yielded the Limoufin, Querci, Perigord, and fome other places, in confideration that Henry and his fon prince Edward renounced, in the fullest manner, all their pretensions to Normandy, Anjou, Maine, Touraine, and Poitou. This compromife was equally fatisfactory to the two kings, and difagreeable to both nations; the English thought their monarch had facrificed his pretentions for a trifle; and the French looked upon that trifle as abfolutely thrown away f. His eldeft fon and heir, prince Lewis, dying, the king A.D. 1261. concluded a match for prince Philip, who was now be- . come the eldeft, with the prince's of Arragon, who had been intended for his brother, and by this alliance fecured the peace of his dominions on that fide.

The reputation of this monarch for candour and juffice His brother Charles of was fo great, that the barons of England, as well as Henry Anjou, de-III, confented readily to make him the umpire of those difclared king ferences which had produced a civil war. The king acof the Two cepted the reference, and heard both parties fairly and coolly : his decifion was, that the proceedings of Oxford were fo indecent towards a crowned head, that they ought to be confidered as null and void; but he decreed, at the fame time, that he king fould firicitly observe the Great Charter, and not violate, on any pretence, the liberties and immunities granted to his fubjects 5. This determi= nation, fair enough in itfelf, was conftrued by both parties in their own fenfe. Henry, and those who continued firm to him, highly approved it, as reftoring the king to his former ftate and dignity; but Simon, earl of Leicefter, the fon of the famous count de Montfort, who had been general of the croifade against the Albigeois, affirmed this decision was in their favour, fince it confirmed the Great Charter, and obliged the king to perform its contents, which was all that was aimed at by the proceedings in the affembly at Oxford; and thus the good intentions of Lewis were frustrated, and this difpute once more was referred to the fword h. In the affair of the pope's conferring the kingdom of the Two Sicilies upon his brother the count of Anjou, the king was rather paffive; and, indeed, it was fuch a kind of grant as a prince, of fo great probity as Lewis certainly was, could hardly approve. The pope had before offered it to the king for one of his own children, which he abfolutely refused, and the pontiff thereupon beftowed it on prince Edmund, fon to the king of England ; but the fituation of things in that kingdom, putting it out of the young prince's power to avail himfelf of this grant, the pope, who knew Charles of Anjou to be a proper inftrument of his refentment, as having a high degree of fierce or rather brutal courage, transferred the title to him. This title, fuch as it was, arole thus i:

His fucceffor, Clement IV. profecuted the fame plan; and though he found Charles in circumstances very unequal to fo arduous an undertaking, and both the king and queen of France very cold in promoting it, yet, by an affiduous application, and the practice of all the arts for which Rome has been ever famous, particularly by proclaiming a croifade in favour of this new king of his creation, he put him at length in a condition to attack Mainfroi with a numerous force k. Charles feconded the views of the pope with all poffible vigour; defeated his competitor in the plains of Beneventum, where Mainfroi was flain upon the fpot; quickly gained poffeffion of both the kingdoms which the pope had given him; and shewed himfelf refolved to maintain them by the fame violent methods by which they had been acquired. The young Conradine, feeing the ufurper flain, endeavoured to vindicate his rights, and foon affembled a very formidable army, composed partly of the friends to his family, but chiefly of the enemies to the French. However, the fortune and the experience of Charles prevailed ; Conradine was defeated in a decifive engagement, taken prifoner, and, by a fhameful act of cruelty, put to death by the fentence of those who styled themselves a court of justice. In this manner Charles fixed himfelf on the throne of the Two Sicilies, and gave rife to what the French style the first house of Anjou 1.

ever fince : he married his children, and affigned them fuitable provisions for their subfiftence, without prejudice to the crown ; he purchafed and united to his domain feveral lordships, the owners of which were the last heirs of their respective families o: he determined the claims that fome of the nobility had upon the crown; and it is very remarkable, that neither he or they made any fcruple of his being judge in his own caufe ; and it is no wonder, for, if the matter was but doubtful, he decided against himfelf, as in the cafe of Matthew de Trie, who claimed the county of Dammartin, as heir to Matilda, countefs of Boulogne, in which he condemned himfelf to reftore it, though it had been united to the crown : he compromifed a dispute between the kings of England and Navarre, about the town of Bayonne. Inftead of availing himfelf of the troubles, he was continually interpoling his good offices with all his neighbours; and though this mediation proceeded, in some measure, from his disposition, yet he made it appear to be good policy, according to his maxim, that a reputation for probity and difinterestedness created an authority that was not to be overthrown. It is certain that, by this conduct he maintained his dominions in peace, reformed the diforders of the ftate, and brought the affairs of the kingdom into very good order. All thefe fteps were taken with a view to a new croifade, which, after his brother was fettled in Sicily, the king undertook ; and his example was fo powerful, that, befides his three fons, and his nephew the count of Artois, most of the great lords of his court engaged in the enterprize. He A.D.1270. embarked again at Aigues Mortes on the 1st of July, directed his courfe for Africa, and landing on the coaft of Barbary, made himfelf mafter of Carthage, and prepared for the fiege of Tunis, the king of which, who was a Mohammedan, had promifed him to become a Chriftian, but did not keep his word P. He was canonized by Boniface VIII. in the month of August 1297, and Lewis XIII. procured the day, dedicated to his honour, to be declared a general featl of the church. By his queen Margaret, daughter of Raymond Berenger, count of Provence, he had eleven children. fix fons, and five daughters. Lewis the eldest died at the age of fixteen, and was interred at St. Denis; Philip, who fucceeded his father in the throne ; John, who died a child ; John, furnamed Triftan, born at Damieta, when his father was a prifoner amongit the infidels. espoufed Violante of Burgundy, countefs of Nevers, died at the fiege of Tunis; Peter, count of Alencon, who efpoufed Joanna, countefs of Blois, who deceased in 1283; Robert, count de Clermont, who efpoufed Beatrix, heirefs of the house of Bourbon; his fon Lewis de Clermont was created duke of Bourbon by Charles the Fair. varre, for the fiefs they held in France; and, notwithftanding the ravages still made by the plague, kept the field against the Moors, and put fo good a face on things, that he received in Africa the furname of the Hardy; which, from his fubfequent conduct in Europe, he would hardly have attained '. However, in a little time he was confined to his bed by fickness; fo that the command devolved on Charles and Thibaut, kings of Sicily and Navarre. They defeated the king of Tunis in two or three engagements, and afterwards prepared to beliege the place in earnest, though the king of Sicily had all along treated privately with the infidels; and at length, with king Philip's confent, concluded a treaty with them. The king's motive to this pacification was the prefling inflances made by the regents, Matthew abbot of St. Denis, and Simon de Clermont count of Nefle, for his return. By the treaty the two kings were to have a large fum of money, under colour of paying the expences of the war; the king of Sicily was to have five years tribute, and the monarch of Tunis was to pay him a double tribute for fifteen years to come : there was alfo a claufe that he fhould permit the Chriftian miffionaries to preach in his dominions, and allow fuch of his fubjects as they fhould convert to be baptized; but this article was purely to fave the honour of the croifade, and without any great hopes of its being performed'. The kings then embarked their army and proceeded to Sicily; but they carried the diftemper with them, of which numbers died after their arrival. The king, to affuage his melancholy, refolved to make a tour through Italy; took Rome in his way, and, after viliting most of the remarkable places, entered his own territories : having repofed himfelf fome time at Lyons, he profecuted A.D.1271. his journey to Paris, where he was received with great acclamations of joy, notwithstanding the finister events of this last and most fatal of all the croifades; for therein the king loft his father, his brother, the count de Nevers ; in Sicily, his brother-in-law the king of Navarre, his own confort Isabel of Arragon, his fifter the queen of Navarre, immediately after her return to Marfeilles, his uncle the count, and his aunt the counters of Poictiers, in their

After the celebration of his father's funeral at St. Denis, He compels and the ceremony of his own coronation, at which the the count de count of Artois carried the fword of Charlemagne, the Foix to furking vifited the frontiers on the fide of Flanders, and propofed afterwards taking poffellion in perfon of the counties of Provence and Thouloufe, which were now united humbles his to the crown, without any thoughts of a military expedi- vafals, tion. This, however, he was conftrained to undertake who had against one of his vaffals. The law made by St Lewis, to all his for preventing private wars, was ftricily executed within predecefthe royal domain; but the royal vaffals held it as a great fors. prerogative to decide their difputes like fovereigns by the fword. The count of Armagnac had taken fome offence at the lord of Cafaubon, and, after the ufual prelude of defiances, came with a great number of his friends to infult him in his caftle : thus provoked, the lord of Cafaubon fallied out, defeated the count of Armagnac, and killed his brother. The latter, highly irritated, and greatly allied, fummoned all his relations, and amongft the reft the count of Foix, to his affiftance : the lord of Cafaubon, feeing the party very unequal, demanded the royal protection, furrendered all his places into the king's hands, yielded himfelf a prifoner, and fubmitted to make any fatisfaction that the law fhould award; upon which the king affigned him the caftle of Sompui, on his own domain, for the refidence of himfelf, his family, and friends, till the caufe could be heard". The count de Foix, notwithstanding this award, took the caftle, and carried away prifoners all who were in it, except the lord of Cafaubon, who made his efcape. For this contempt the king fummoned him thrice to appear, and on his flighting those citations, marched with an army and invested the caftle of Foix, which was looked upon as impregnable. In a fhort time, however, the king reduced the count and his garrifon to extremities, who thereupon offered to capitulate. The death of Henry, king of Navarre, gave Philip an opportunity of aggrandizing his family, which he did not neglect. That prince left by his queen, the daughter of Robert, count of Artois, and niece of St. Lewis, an only daughter, whom Philip took under his protection, with intent to marry her to his eldeft fon Philip; but, as they of Edward were related, a difpensation was necessary. This was vehemently oppofed by the kings of Caftile and Arragon, at the court of Rome, who represented to the pope, that Sicily, being already in the hands of a French prince, it would be very unreasonable to put it in the power of the king of France to add Navarre alfo to his dominions, more especially as he pretended a claim to the crown of Castile *. On the other hand, Gregory X. to whom Philip had given the county of Venaiilin, was very defirous to gratify the king; but that he might keep fome meafures with other princes, he granted the difpenfation for his fecond fon Lewis, which, though with fome reluctancy, Philip accepted, and fent the count of Artois with a French army into Navarre. After this provision for his younger fon, he thought fit to marry himfelf, and chofe for his confort one of the most beautiful princesses of that age, Mary, the daughter of the duke of Brabant y. He celebrated his nup. tials with great magnificence, and, to the fatisfaction which this gave him, he added another, which was receiving the homage of Edward, king of England, for the lands he held in France. This ceremony, however, was attended with a circumstance not altogether fo agreeable : Lewis, his father, had engaged in his treaty with Henry III. that if the country of Agenois reverted to the crown, it fhould be yielded to him or his heirs; and as by the death of the count of Poictiers it was reverted, Edward put in his claim. The country was in itfelf of great importance, and more fo from its fituation; but the cafe was clear, and A.D. 1274. Philip caufed the king to be put in poficition of it 2. An act of justice that fecured him the friendship of a prince, who, in all respects, was the most capable of giving him disturbance.

While there was a kind of rup- days ieno. ture between the kingdoms of France and Caftile, in con- minioufly fequence of which an infurrection appeared in Navarre, an on a gib. unlucky event in France filled the king and his fubjects bet. with great perplexity : Lewis, his eldeft fon and heir apparent, died fuddenly, at the age of twelve years, with circumftances that created a fufpicion of poifon b. One Peter de la Broffe, who had been about the perfon of St. Lewis, but in no higher character than that of a barber, had engroffed the favour of Philip, who raifed him to the poft of high chamberlain, made him his first and almost fole minifter, and fuffered him to fill all employments, ecclefiaftical and civil, with his creatures and relations. This man, perceiving that the king had an extreme tendernefs for his young wife, took umbrage at it, and either raifed or encouraged a rumour, that the had procured his fon's death. As this report made Philip exceedingly uneafy, La Broffe put it into his head to confult a certain nun, who pretended to revelations. The king fent the abbot of St. Denis, and the bifhop of Evreux, who was the brother of La Broffe's wife. This prelate first visited the nun, and drew from her what he pleafed in confession, fo that when the abbot came fhe would fay nothing. The king, difappointed and difpleafed at the bithop's report, fent other perfons, in whom he could confide, to the nun, who then anfwered clearly that the king ought to defpife what was told him to the prejudice of his confort, becaufe it was falfe . This declaration laid the foundation of La Broffe's ruin, who, being foon after charged with holding a private correspondence with the king of Castile, and betraying his mafter's fecrets, was fent to prifon, and his family difgraced, to the no fmall fatisfaction of the nobility and the people. But being afterwards condemned without an open trial, and the duke of Brabant her brother, and two or three other lords of her party, being eye witnesses of his execution, the popular tide turned, and La Broffe, who was before thought a criminal d, was now confidered as a victim to the refertment of the queen and her family; a circumftance which gave the king great uneafinefs, and was the prelude to those unfortunate events that embittered the remaining part of his life.

The feverity of the king of the Two Sicilies had not only of the jubrendered him, but his family, odious, to a great part of his fubjects; and the infolence and debauchery of the Charles of French troops had excited an irreconcileable averfion to Anjsu, and the whole nation. At the fame time, the immerfurable the famous Sicilian ambition of Charles, who was actually preparing to attack Vespers. the emperor Michael Paleologus, and was fufpected to have an eye alfo to the German empire raifed a general diftaste against him amongst all his neighbours ". Pope Nicholas III. was of this number, and had received worfe imprefiions of him than any, which induced him, if he is not fiandered by the French hiftorians, to concur in, if not to contrive the scheme for his destruction, though this did not operate till immediately after his deceafe. It began by the general maffacre of the French troops in Sicily, on the evening of Easter-day, fo famous to all posterity A.D. 1282. by the name of the Sicilian Vespers f. Don Pedro, king of Arragon, who had married the daughter of Mainfroi, fupported the Sicilians, and openly claimed the kingdom in her right. In this fituation Charles had no hopes but from France, where the nobility in general had a great affection for him, and very readily offered to furnish troops for his fupport. Pope Martin, who had fucceeded Nicholas, was also entirely in the interest of Charles, who might probably have recovered his kingdom, if he had not been amused by Don Pedro's challenging him to decide their difputes by a perfonal combat at Bourdeaux, which Charles, who wanted not courage, accepted. Don Pedro, as we have fhewn in its proper place, having very dextroufly faved his honour and avoided the combat, profecuted the war with advantage g. The pope, zealous for Charles, excommunicated the king of Arragon, and gave his dominions to which of his younger fons the king of France fhould be pleafed to name, who was to hold them as a vafial to the Roman fee h. Philip, flattered by this propofal, declared his fon Charles de Valois, king of Arragon and Valentia, and count of Barcelona. The French army, under the command of king Philip, penetrated into Catalonia, and laid fiege to Gironne, which made a gallant defence. Don Pedro being in the neighbourhood with a fmall army, and attacking a convoy that was going to the French camp, received a mortal wound. Gironne being furrendered, and the king having put a good garrifon into it, he difmiffed part of his fleet, which confifted of three hundred fail, being flips that he had hired from fome of the Italian republics. The king taking this reverse of fortune to heart, fell fick, and died at Perpignan, about the middle of the month of September, in the forty-first year of his age, and in the fixteenth of his reign ", extremely regretted by his army, and not lefs by his fubjects in general; for though he loved money rather more than became a king, yet he was very tender in imposing taxes, and, when he did, levied them fo mildly, and with fuch equality, that the people never expreffed any impatience (K).

In the reign of this prince a great change was made with regard to the fucceffion to the domains of younger fons to the crown ; for upon the deceafe of Alonfo, count of Poitiers, his fucceffion was claimed by Charles, king of Sicily, as heir by defcent, and by Philip, king of France, as reverting to the crown, in whofe favour it was determined by the parliament at the term of All-Saints, 1283. This prince, by his first wife Donna Isabella, daughter to the king of Arragon, had four fons : Lewis, who deceased five years after his mother; Philip, who fucceeded his father Charles count of Valois; Alençon, who was the founder of the royal house of Valois; and Robert, who died young. terminated alfo in an amicable manner fome other differences that had arifen between the two crowns, with which conduct Edward was fo well pleafed, that he came to make the king a vifit at Amiens; went with him to Paris, and there did homage for the dominions he held in France ?. Edward, after this interview, went to Bourdeaux, where he held a parliament, and where, with great flate, he received the ambafladors of Caftile, Arragon, and Sicily; a circumftance which gave Philip great pain, as he was at war with all thefe crowns, and therefore fufpected that fome negociation to his prejudice was on the carpet. But in this opinion he was absolutely miftaken; for Edward had nothing farther in view than to facilitate a general peace, and to procure the liberty of Charles the Lame, for whom he had a great affection P. He at length concluded a treaty with the king of Arragon, and though the terms were hard, Charles would gladly have accepted them; but upon laying it before pope Honorius for his approbation, he declared it null, and preffed king Philip to carry on the war against the crown of Arragon, with an offer of taxing his clergy for the fupport of it. This pope dying, was fucceeded by Nicholas the Fourth, who had fomewhat more moderation; and king Edward, renewing his folicitations to the king of Arragon, prevailed upon him to fet Charles at liberty, upon giving hoftages for the performance of the terms itipulated, and a ranform of fif- A.D.1288. ty thousand livres, twenty thousand of which Edward . agreed to pay 9. Charles being at liberty, and perceiving fome hopes of retrieving his affairs, preffed king Philip to carry on the war in behalf of his brother Charles of Valois, inftead of engaging him to perfuade that prince to lay afide the title of Arragon, to which he was bound both by the treaty and his oath. However, thefe military operations not having answered his defire, the king of England infifted on the performance of those articles, in refpect to which he was bound. Charles found it his intereft to prefs this point at the court of France; and, perceiving it could be no other way obtained, gave his eldeft daughter in marriage to Charles of Valois, and with her the counties of Anjou and Maine, in compensation for his claim upon Arragon; a claim no better founded than in a bull, granted by a paffionate pope, for giving away the dominions of a prince who would not fubmit to be governed by him <sup>7</sup>. The quarrel with Caftile had been fome time before adjufted, at the expence of the infants De la Cerda, whom king Philip, finding it inconfiftent with his intereft to fuftain, was content to abandon. Charles of Sicily alfo having quarrelled with the count of Artois, that prince returned with moft of the French troops that had ferved under him in Italy; fo that peace on all fides was now in fome meafure eftablifhed, to the great fatisfaction of king Philip, though things did not long remain in this ftate <sup>4</sup>.

The two kings Philip and Edward, who had hitherto lived on the beft terms imaginable, and whole right correspondence was of fo great confequence to their respective countries, were on a fudden involved in a war, as if it had been by accident<sup>1</sup>. The immediate caufe of this war was a quarrel between a Gafcon and a Norman failor; the latter had attempted to flab the former, who efcaping the blow, by his agility, the Norman fell upon his own weapon. The crews of their respective ships immediately took part in the quarrel, and fought it out at fea. Soon after a fleet of Norman veffels engaged an English fleet in the fame caufe, without the interpolition of authority on either fide. At length, the Normans making prize of English ships, Edward commanded reprifals, and then the matter began to grow ferious. Philip fent ambaffadors to London, who demanded fatisfaction in very high terms. Edward gave them good words, and promifed an anfwer by ambaffadors of his own, who were fent back with them ". These ambaffadors acquainted king Philip, that, holtilities having been reciprocally committed by the fubjects of the two crowns, the difpute was to be confidered. as between the English and French nations; which, however, Edward was very defirous flould be amicably determined. As a farther proof of this pacific difpolition, he fent over his brother, prince Edmund, to expottulate the matter with Philip; to fhew him the impropriety of pretending to fummon him as a vaffal to the parliament, to abide the judgment of his peers; and at the fame time to affure him, that, as he had formerly had first justice done him by the king in France, he fhould, on a proper complaint, render the like justice to the subjects of France in England. Philip, miftaking condefcention for fubmiffion, perfifted in his own way, fummoned Edward as a peer of France to his parliament; and, upon his refufal, declared all the effates he poffeffed in that kingdom forfeited for this act of felony. A proceeding which the French hiftorians acknowlege to have been equally violent and unjust, and which they likewife own Edward bore with extraordinary patience w.

Both monarchs began to enter into alliances, and to King Phimake preparations for war: but the queen of France, and lip, through the queen-mother, very defirous to prevent a rupture if a breach of possible, fent for Edmund earl of Lancaster, Edward's brings on brother, back to the French court, and made the follow- a war ing propofals : that, to fatisfy king Philip, the king of with Ed-England should order fix fortresses in Guienne to be de- ward king livered up, and fhould permit him to name an officer to command in each of the great towns of that duchy, three only excepted; that upon this ceffion, the fummons fhould be recalled, the judgment of parliament reverfed, and, a fafe-conduct being granted to king Edward, Philip and he should have an interview at Amiens, where all things might be finally adjusted; and that in the mean time the places yielded for faving the king's honour fhould be refored. This agreement, being reduced to writing, was transmitted to Edward, who readily confented to it, and fent over to his brother the neceffary orders for the general, who commanded in Guienne, and for the governors of all the ftrong places in that country. But earl Edmund, before he made use of these orders, had the precaution to demand an explicit approbation of this agreement from the king's own mouth; who, in the prefence of the queen of Navarre his confort, and of her mother queen Blanch, the duke of Burgundy, Hugh Vere, fon to the earl of Oxford, and John Lacey, an ecclefiaftic, promifed, that he would abide by the convention. Upon this affurance, the earl of Lancaster dispatched the orders he had received into Guienne, and John de St. John, Edward's general, believing all differences between the two kings at an end, fold the ammunition and provisions out of his magazines, and the governors of the fortrefles, purfuant to the orders they had received, opened their gates to the French. But, Philip, being once in poffeffion, difavowed the treaty made by the queens, and fent the conftable of France, with an army, to fecure what he had thus basely obtained. Edward, in refentment of this perfidy, immediately declared war, and at the fame time acquainted king Philip, that he looked upon himfelf as releafed, by this notorious breach of faith, from his former obligations; that therefore he renounced his homage, and would acknowlege himfelf no longer his vaffal for any thing he held in France x.

The con-Sequences and iffue of this war till concluded by a truce.

It is agreed by the hiftorians of both nations, that the war thus begun was carried on with great vigour on both fides. John de St. John, who was fent back to his command, made himfelf master of the important town of Bayonne, and of feveral other places, while the French, who were not at all idle, made a great progrefs on their fide. The count de Valois alfo entered Gafcony with a numerous army. At the fame time Matthew de Montmorency, and John de Harcourt, with a powerful fleet, attempted a descent upon England, burned the town of Dover, and fome villages on the coaft; but the English, in return, landed on the coaft of Normandy, and deftroy-A.D. 1296. ed Cherburg, and the places adjacent y. Next year, Edmund earl of Lancatter commanded for his brother in Guienne, where he recovered feveral places, and would have done more if he had not been feized with a dangerous diftemper, of which he died not long after at Bayonne. But what the king of England chiefly depended upon, was the alliance he made with the emperor Adolphus of Naffau, the counts of Bretagne, Holland, Bar, Juliers, Guelders, and Flanders. Philip, who had treated the emperor very rudely, was obliged to repair that fault by an embaffy; and this perhaps would have produced no great effect, if it had not been accompanied with a round fum of money, which the preffing neceffities of that great prince obliged him to accept. At the fame time Philip fent as large a fum to Albert duke of Auftria; who fharing this money with the leffer German princes, they formed a defign to raife him to the imperial throne; in which they fucceeded, the emperor Adolph being killed in the difpute. By the fame powerful argument Philip wrought upon the reft of Edward's allies, the count of Flanders only excepted, against whom he acted by force of arms, and would have probably reduced him to great extremities, if king Edward had not come with a fleet and army to his relief 2. Philip then dexteroufly changed his conduct, and, by declaring for the commons in the feveral cities of Flanders, excited a revolt at Ghent. in which Edward was very near loling his life. A negociation was now fet on foot, and a truce concluded, through the interpolition of Charles king of Sioily, whole gratitude to Edward prompted him to act as a mediator upon this occasion. This truce was at first but for a few months; but, for their mutual conveniency, the two kings afterwards extended it to two years, and, as it was made in order to promote a peace, all points in difference between them were referred to the mediation of the pope". By A. D. 1297. letters patents, dated in the month of September this year, the king, to replace the peerage of Champagne now in himfelf, erected Bretagne into a dukedom and peerage, in favour of John de Dreux, a prince of his blood, who had espoufed Beatrix, fifter to king Edward of England.

One of the most remarkable occurrences in his reign Original of was the quarrel between king Philip and Boniface the the diffutes Eighth, which began before this time, and which feemed between to be accommodated by the two kings accepting him for this mothe umpire of their differences. This pontiff was certain-Beniface ly a man of parts, but even these were inferior to his FIII. pride; he had more learning than judgment, and, with much fpirit and penetration, wanted fagacity and fleadinefs. He had indeed the appearance of both; for his policy, at bottom, was but cunning, and the firmnefs, of which he made a fnew, proceeded rather from the obflinacy of his temper than from a rational fortitude. The quality which particularly diffinguished him was a fupercilious haughtinefs, which led him to imagine himfelf as much fuperior to other princes as they were to private men; and this was peculiarly offenfive to Philip, from the ftrong tincture he had of the fame kind of weaknefs in himfelf b. The first thing which gave offence to Philip, was his forbidding the clergy in general to grant any. aids or .fubfidies to prince, without leave first obtained from the holy fee, under pain of excommunication. Philip encountered this prohibition by an edict, forbidding any of his clergy to fend any moncy abroad without his leave. The pope next attempted to force a croifade upon the lofs of Ptolemais, or Acon, the laft place which the Chriftians held in the Eaft ; to which Philip would not confent. But what was most provoking, was the manner in which he interposed between the two kings, directing them, in the molt peremptory manner, to make peace, and to fubmit their difputes to the decision of his tribunal. His infolence was equally refented in France and England, upon which he thought proper to give fo foft a turn to the fwelling terms of his propofals, that the two kings, finding it for their interefts, confented that he fhould act as umpire. The project he dictated was this; that Guienne fhould be reftored to king Edward, and that he fhould do homage as in times paft; that the places in difpute fhould be fequestered in his (the pope's) hands; that the ships and effects taken should, as far as possible, be reftored, and fuch farther fatisfaction made as the pope fhould hold reafonable; that king Edward flould marry the princefs Margaret, the king's fifter; and that his fon Edward fhould efpoufe Ifabel king Philip's daughter . But, many things yet remaining unfettled, the truce was prolonged, and the quarrel between Boniface and Philip reviving, excluded the pope from having any thing farther to do with their affairs. Thefe monarchs having, at length, accommodated all differences by a definitive treaty, Phi-A.D. 1301, lip received the homage of Edward on the 20th of May, at Paris; where they also concluded a defensive alliance against all fuch as fhould difturb, impeach, or trouble, the faid kings in their franchifes, liberties, privileges, or cultoms, in their refpective realms; a treaty which was understood to be a league against the pope d.

Revivalof ences, and methods taken by the king and pope to [upport their re-(pestive powers.

It is impossible for us to enter into the detail of the retheir differ- vived quarrel between the king and the pope, the hiftory of which actually makes a confiderable volume. It is fufficient for our purpofe to fay, that Boniface was in general the aggreffor : he had erected the abbey of Pamiers into a bifhoprick, without the confent or approbation of the king, in favour of Bernard Sayfeti, who was very obnoxious to Philip. On the other hand the king granted his protection to the Colonnas, whom the pope perfecuted with implacable malice, and who, for very plaufible reafons, refufed to acknowlege him for pope °. To infult him farther, the pope iffued bull after bull, affuming to himfelf a fovereignty over the king and his fubjects; he wrote him a letter, in which he told him he was a fool, if he made any doubt of this fovereignty, or of his power to correct him, and call him to an account'. He named this very bithop of Pamiers his legate, who not only delivered arrogant meffages from Boniface to the king, but took the liberty of speaking very disrespectfully to him and of him, and entered into intrigues of a treafonable nature; for which the king caufed him to be arrefted, and fent out of his dominions. Boniface, upon this flep, fummoned the clergy and doctors of France to affift at a council he anpointed at Rome, to enquire into Philip's conduct. The king encountered this by affembling the flates, and not only drew from the clergy and nobility, but alfo from the magistrates and reprefentatives of cities, a clear acknowlegement of his own fovereignty, a difavowal of the pope's authority, and an appeal to a general council, under a future pope, regularly elected, against the violent and illegal proceedings of Boniface, whofe title was now drawn into dispute s.

The pope notwithstanding proceeded to hold his coun- Pope Bonicil at Rome, at which a confiderable number of the French face feized clergy affilted; for which reason the king feized their by the temporalities at home. He alfo recalled his brother Charles partizans. of Valois, who had been the pope's general, and on and dies whom, in right of his fecond wife, the daughter of Bald- of chagrin win, emperor of Conftantinople, he had beftowed that for his all lofty title; but who, in quitting Italy, had left numbers of those, who had ferved under him, very well affected to the French nation h. Philip, therefore, doubting what the confequence might be of these disputes, in case they flould be longer protracted, and apprehending that Boniface would have recourfe to the feverest ecclesiastical cenfure, refolved to prevent him. With this view, he fent William de Nogaret and Sciarra Colonna into Tufcany, with a large fum of money, giving out, that, fince other measures had failed, he would try whether peace could not be purchased. These agents raised with great fecrecy a body of determined men, and with them fuddenly invefted Anegnia, where the pope was born, and which was now the place of his refidence'. The inhabitants, corrupted by money, joined with them, and feized on his perfon; when Sciarra not only infulted but ftruck him, and, if Nogaret had not interpoled, would have killed him: but after fome days the popular tide turned, and the inhabitants, having taken him out of their hands, fent him under a good efcort to Rome, where he died of a difeafe brought upon him by anxiety, and the ill ufage he had received. Such was the iffue of this famous quarrel, which, inftead of leffening the royal authority in France, or extending the papal power, eftablished the former, and effectually circumferibed the latter <sup>k</sup>. This blow was firuck very opportunely, for the pope had actually a bull by him, which he intended to publ. In next day, for excommunicating the king, and for releafing his fubjects from their obedience.

The king, during the courfe of thefe events, was embarked in the war of Flanders, which he had determined to unite to the crown, and therefore would never fuffer the count Guy de Dampier to be included in the peace with England. The Flemings were at this time exceffively rich, their cities populous and well built, but at the fame time they were divided amongst themfelves, and there was a ftrong faction in favour of France. Philip flattered thefe, and fent his brother Charles of Valois to reduce their opponents. A divided people are incapable of making a vigorous defence. The count de Valois was a good officer, had a powerful army of well-difciplined troops, and good intelligence in most of the places he was to attack. With these advantages he foon brought things to fuch a pafs, that the count found himfelf under the neceffity of recurring to the king's mercy. Charles received the old man with humanity; promifed that neither he nor his fons fhould be confined; and that if, within the fpace of a year, he could not compromife matters with the king, they fhould be at liberty to return home, and take whatever measures they thought proper. After this transaction Charles entered Paris in triumph, and the queen, who mortally hated the count of Flanders, pleafed herfelf with looking upon him and his fons as they paffed in the proceffion !. It had been well if her refentment had ftopped there; but, in conjunction with the count of Artois, the engaged Philip to difavow the treaty which his brother had made; to fend the count prifoner to Compeigne, and his two fons to different caffles. The king and queen went afterwards into Flanders, not as con-

He had courage and abilities, but he was proud and haughty; the magistrates made great court to him, and, in return, he fupported their authority, even when they made an ill use of it. This conduct produced murmurs, and these were followed with chastilements: the towns were most of them open; he repaired their fortifications, and in feveral places built citadels, to bridle their inhabitants; but, what is very wonderful, he forgot garrifons, which, indeed, were not in ufe in those days but in war. The people of Bruges, headed by a dyer, revolted; Ghent and other places followed their example; but the French faction and the magistrates were fill fo powerful, that they were foon calmed, and the dver and his affociates banifhed ".

There the diffute might have ended; but Chatillon, The new who had now a body of troops about him, entered Bruges war bein triumph, and proposed, when he had posted them pro- comes very perly, to have employed the contents of a couple of hog- the army fheads filled with ropes, in ftifling what he called rebel- commanied The people having notice of this defign, took their by the count lion. measures with such fecrecy, that, recalling the dyer, they d' Artois furprifed the governor, and killed fifteen hundred out of veaten. feventeen hundred French horfe, which he had brought to be fpcctators of the execution he intended. He himfelf hardly efcaped, by fwimming the town ditch in the night. Three fons of the count, who had retired to Namur, which belonged to their mother, quickly returned, and put themfelves at the head of the people, and gradually recovered the best part of the country °. Philip found himfelf much embarraffed, but, having raifed a numerous army, he fent it under the command of the count of Artois to chaftife the Flemings. The young princes were then belieging Courtray, and their army confilled of near fixty thousand men, but they were new raifed, and very ill armed. However, they fortified their camp, and continued the fiege. The count of Artois, contrary to the opinion of the conftable de Nelle, refolved to attack them in their intrenchments, though the ftrength of his army confifted in cavalry; the confequence was a total defeat, in which the count and the conftable both fell, with about twenty thoufand men P .. This fo irritated Philip, that, to raife a new army, he diminished his coin a third part, that is, he obliged his fubjects to take a groat for fix pence; and, having affembled the whole force of France, threatened the Flemings with extirpation. The young princes provided the beft they could for their defence; but Edward king of England, who faw his old allies fuffer with infinite concern, told his oueen. as a great fecret, that the pope had fome partizans in the French army, who would take their opportunity to deliver the king to the Flemings. She, as he expected, gave notice of it to her brother, and Philip, under pretence that the feafon was too far advanced, retired without doing any thing. It may not be amifs to obferve, that thefe two monarchs, Philip and Edward, underftood each other's maxims perfectly well; for as the latter had abandoned the Flemings, the former had left the Scots out of the treaty, fo that they provided for their own interests, and gratified each other's refentments, at the expence of their allies 9.

King Philip enters Flanders with the whole force of his dominions.

It was fome confolation to Philip, that the fleet which he furnished to his ally the count of Hainault, who was alfo at war with the Flemings, gained a great naval victory; but the reader must not imagine from hence, that, at this junclure, the French were powerful by fea, for this fleet was composed chiefly of the Genoese gallies, and their admiral was Rainald de Grimaldi, who took Guy, fon to the count of Flanders, prifoner, and fent him to Paris. Philip, finding the war expensive, tedious, and hazardous, confented to a kind of truce, and, releafing the old count of Flanders, fent him to try what he could do with his fubjects; but upon express condition, that, if he could not bring them to the king's terms, he fhould return; which he did, and died foon after at Compiegne at the age of fourfcore. The king, having by this time recruited his army, marched with his brothers the counts of Valois and Evreux, the flower of the French nobility, and the whole force of the kingdom, against the Flemings, who had still three fons of their count at their head.

Philip,

Philip, who had ferved long in Sicily, having brought with him a fmall corps of Italians, was intrusted with the chief command, whom his brethren and the whole nation willingly obeyed '. He acted as long as it was poffible on the defensive, but the French king at length penetrated into Flanders, eager to terminate this long difpute by a general action, and came up with the Flemish army at Mons en Puelle '.

The young prince Philip, knowing the French force Gains a confifted in cavalry, that he had none to oppose them, great vicand that they had the advantage of ground, fortified his tory, but camp with his carriages, determined to defend it to the prudent, laft extremity. The French advancing on all fides to in- morautifult them, the Flemings iffued out; but were repulfed flanding, to with great lofs. After they retired to their camp, it was conclude a debated, whether they flould retreat in the night; but peace. the people in general preffed their officers to attack, in their turn, the French camp; which feheme they executed immediately, with fuch fpirit, that they penetrated, in a quarter of an hour, to the king's tent, where they found the tables covered for fupper. Philip had but just time to escape, and, having happily found a horfe, rallied fome of his troops, and attacked the enemy. The greatest part of the French army, who fled at the beginning, hearing of the king's danger, and being encouraged by the great lords, returned to the charge, and, after an obftinate difpute, drove out the Flemings with prodigious flaughter t. After this action the king invefted Lifle, into which Philip of Flanders had thrown himfelf with what troops he could collect, and here the king expected the war would have ended, the place having capitulated, in cafe it was not relieved by the first of October; but, when it was least expected, John de Namur appeared with an army of fixty thousand men, undifciplined indeed, but daring and desperate ; fo that the king, by the advice of the duke of Brabant, and other great lords, confented to fet Robert de Bethune, the eldest fon of the count of Flanders, at liberty, to receive his homage for the county, to accept of eight hundred thousand livres for the expences of the war, and to have certain places delivered into his hands by way of fecurity, till this fum should be paid ". We must now refume the transactions between this monarch and the fee of Rome, which were interrupted, in order to give a more diftinct account of the war of Philip, des, Flanders. After the death of Boniface, the cardinals fpeedily elected Nicholas Boccacini, who affumed the name of Benedict the Eleventh y. He was a mild, good man, and, being defirous to ufe his power for the promoting of peace, revoked the excommunication which his predeceffor had fulminated against Philip; emitting fix new bulls, by which, in a great measure, all things were put again into their former ftate. He alfo pardoned the Colonnas, and thewed a ftrong difpolition to reform that corruption, which had fpread through the dominions of the church z. Thefe proceedings, while they gained him the approbation of all virtuous and worthy men, excited the hatred of fuch as were of a different difpolition ; fo that, before he had accomplished much, he was removed by poifon 2. In the conclave after his death, which fublifted feveral months, the Italian and the French factions were fo nicely balanced, that there could have been no election, if the former had not propofed to name three eminent perfons amongst the clergy on the other fide of the mountains, out of which they might name one who was to be unanimoufly proclaimed pope. This expedient being accepted, they named three archbilhops, all partizans of Boniface the Eighth, and amongft thefe was Bertrand de Got, archbishop of Bourdeaux b. King Philip, being informed of this nomination, and happening to receive the news when he was in Poiton, fent to defire the archbishop would meet him, as if it was by chance, in a wood. There the king told him, he would certainly make him pope, if he would promife him an abfolute pardon for all that had been done against Boniface; an authentic condemnation of the conduct and memory of that pontiff; the restitution of the honours and estates of the Colonnas; the tenths of the clergy of France for five years; and another requeft which he would make to him at a proper time. Bertrand, without hefitation, accepted

The new pontiff, to the great regret of the Italian car- A D 1305. dinals, refolved to be crowned at Lyons; where the cere-mony was performed accordingly, on the 14th of November. In returning from the church to his palace, the pope at Lyon, was on horfeback with his triple crown on his head, and und rethe king of France, his brothers, the counts de Valois and moves the Evreux, and the duke of Bretagne, led the beaft by turns. Papal refi-This proceffion, however, would not have claimed a place Rome to in our hiftory, but for the accident which attended it; Avienon. for a great number of fpectators having taken post upon an old wall, it fell down at once. The pope had his tiara beat off, the king, and the count de Valois were wounded, the duke de Bretagne, the pope's brother, and feveral other perfons of diffinction, were bruiled to death . Such was the introduction of the papal court into France; for this pontiff and feveral of his fucceffors leaving Rome, fixed their feat at Avignon. Clement performed his promifes tolerably well; he revoked or foftened all the bulls that Boniface had iffued; he granted the king the tenths of the clergy for the term required; he created feveral cardinals at his requeft; but for ftigmatizing the memory of Boniface he took time, under pretence of examining witneffes; at length it ended in a juflification of his predeceffor, in which the king acquiefeed, as finding it unavoidable. Philip found it neceffary to fend his fon Lewis into Navarre, where he took the title of king, as heir of his mother. He had the fatisfaction alfo of feeing the marriage completed between his daughter Ifabel and Edward the Second, become lately king of England, with whom he had an interview at Bologne, where Edward did him homage for the duchy of Guienne, and the county of Ponthieu. The death of the emperor Albert of Auftria, who was affaffinated by his nephew, afforded Philip an opportunity of difclofing to the pope his laft demand, which he had to long kept fecret, and which, if he had ftill retained it in his own breaft, would have infallibly taken effect; but the king having declared in council that his view was to fet his brother Charles of Valois upon the imperial throne, he was advifed to demand affiftance of the pope in perfon, attended by his court and a good body of troops, an advice which the king relifhed; but while he was making the neceffary preparations, Clement was informed of his intention, and wrote in ftrong terms to the electors, that they could not do any thing better for themfelves, or the peace of Europe, than to chufe an emperor without delay, and named to them Henry of Luxemburgh; fo that, before the king arrived at Avignon, the election was over, and Clement delivered from the apprehensions of being diftreffed by a French king on the one fide, and a French emperor on the other<sup>d</sup>. Philip, however, had better fuccefs in another project, which was that of re-uniting the city of Lyous to the realm of France, from which it had been formerly detached to make a part of the kingdom of Arles. It was at this time a kind of principality, in the hands of its archbishop, who, partly by fair promifes, but chiefly by the appearance of Lewis king of Navarre with an army at its gates, was conftrained, under certain conditions, to render it to the crown. This was juftly confidered as a great acquisition, though the king ftill fuffered the archbishop to fivie himfelf count of Lyons s.

A refolutun taken to humble the powerjul order of knights Templars.

Philip had all this time a very troublefome affair upon his hands, of which the world knew not what to think in his own time, and with respect to which the sentiments of posterity have been, and perhaps ever will be divided. This was the profecution of the knights Templars, a military order that had been effablished for the protection of fuch as went in pilgrimage to the Holy Land, and which had received its name from a houfe, or palace, given them by one of the kings of Jerufalem near the temple. This order had fublifted near two hundred years, was spread through the dominions of all Christian princes, had valt poficifions in land, was immenfely rich, and compoled of men of the best families in every nation throughout Europe f. They were indeed very much declined from that . reputation in which they had formerly flood; were deeply tinged with the corruption of the age in which they . lived, were extremely hated for their pride and luxury, and, amongst other vices, were particularly decried for drunkennefs; infomuch, that to drink like a Templar was become a proverb<sup>g</sup>. Two of this order being fentenced by the grand-mafter to perpetual imprifonment, the one a Frenchman for herefy, the other an Italian, for a multitude of crimes, infinuated, that if they might have life and liberty given them, they would difcover certain fecret practices of their order that were little fuspected. These men being admitted as witneffes, depefed, amongst other horrible things, that, at their entrance into the order. every knight was obliged to renounce his Saviour, to ro through feveral indecent and filthy ceremonies, and were, through their whole lives, indulged in the most horrid and abon inable of all lufts b. The king received these informations before the pope's coronation, and had then feveral conferences with him on this fubject, which induced the pope 10 command James de Molai, the grandmafter, and other great officers of the order, to repair into France, under pretence of concerting meafures for a new croifade; where, with the reft of the knights Templars, to the number of a hundred and forty, they were arrefted, by the command of king Philip, in one day, and committed to feveral prifons 1.

At first the pope feemed to be in great doubt in this That order matter, and to proceed in it more vigoroufly by degrees, in the through the evidence that was brought out in profecutions council of before his inquifitor, joined with the king's commiffaries, Vienne. to whom the greateft part of the knights freely confeffed all that had been laid to their charge, and gave a diffinct and particular account of all their horrid practices, to which the first witneffes had deposed. But still a confiderable number perfifted firmly in denying every word of what had been advanced; afferting, that those who had confeffed did it through fear of death, through force of torture, or through flattering promifes of life and libertyk. Between fifty and fixty of thefe fuffered death, in a field near the convent of St. Anthony at Paris, and died with great steadiness, and piety, professing their innocence to the laft 1. The pope, to put an end to this and to other A.D. 1112. perplexed affairs, appointed a general council to be held -at Vienne, in Dauphiny, where, on the 22d of May, in the prefence of the king, the count de Valois his brother, Lewis king of Navarre, and the other two princes his fons, a bull, for the condemnation and extinction of the order, was published. Their cftates, except in Castile, Arragon, Portugal, and Majorca, were given to the knights of St. John of Jerufalem, otherwife knights of Rhodes, and now of Malta, but without hearing the knights in their own defence, though they demanded it with great earneftnefs, the grand-mafter and other great officers being referved to a future judgment<sup>m</sup>. In this council the memory of pope Boniface the Eighth was freed from all imputation of herefy, feveral doctors making long speeches in support of his innocence. After this declaration, two Catalan knights entered, and threw down their gauntlets, offering to prove, at their launces point, against any of the king of France's fubjects, the innocence of the deceased pope, in respect of the charges that had been brought against him, not only as to herefy, but as to impiety, atheifm, and immorality; with which defiance, though king Philip wes by no means pleafed, yet things were fo circumflanced, that he was obliged to feem contented ".

James de Molai, grand-mafter of the knights Templars, mafter and and the three great officers of the order, finding they were not fet at liberty, after five years confinement, infifted upon being brought to a trial, and, upon their own confessions, which were very full and express, were conthe knights demned to fuffer perpetual imprisonment, after making open acknowlegement of their crimes before the people. A fcaffold was fet up before the great porch of the Notre Dame, upon which the criminals were placed, in the prefence of feveral cardinals, and other perfons of diffinction, and of a prodigious multitude of people, where their fentence and confessions being read, they defired leave to fpeak °. This being granted, James de Molai declared, with a loud voice, that all they had heard was abfolutely falfe, that they had been threatened and feduced into those confellions, and that, though themfelves and their brethren had frailties and failings as well as other men, yet, with refpect to those impieties and impurities that had been charged upon them, they were abfolutely innocent. The king being informed of this declaration, was fo enraged, that he ordered them all to be burnt in a flow fire behind the garden wall of his palace, where they fuffered with preat composure and constancy; a circumstance the more extraordinary, as the grand-mafter was of a very fickle difpolition, had confessed and recanted feveral times, and thewed fuch a weaknefs of fpirit as had rendered him very defpicable P. It is reported that, a little befere he expired, he fummoned the pope in forty days, and the king in four months, to answer at the divine tribunal for the murder of himfelf and his brethren. Of the original accufers it was remarked, that the Frenchman was affaffinated as foon as he was releafed out of prifon, and that the Italian, having committed a murder, was hanged for it not long after. The order, however, was every where suppressed in England by authority of parliament, but upon general fuggeftions, and the knights were confined to certain convents, with handfome allowances, upon which they lived regularly, and without affording the leaft countenance to the imputation that had been caft upon their order 9. In the Spanish kingdoms the Templars fuffered no injury in their perfons, but their lands were appropriated to other religious orders, or to the defence of the countries, where they were fituated, against the Moors. In fhort, it has been much doubted, whether the greateft crime of thefe knights was not their wealth and their poffessions. The immense riches found in their houfes, which every where bore the name of Temples, was also confifcated '.

There happened fome diffutes between the king and The affairs his fon-in-law Edward the Second of Enngland, which of king his fon-in-law Edward the Second of Enngland, which gives feem to have arifen chiefly from mifunderstandings be- Phip take arift tark tween their officers in frontier places; yet they might at home have produced a rupture, if both princes had not been and equally unwilling to come to extremities. To prevent abroad. thefe, Edward, with his queen Ifabel, repaired to Paris, and having paffed fome time there in the most agreeable manner, all things were amicably adjusted, and king Philip fubfcribed an act, by which all memory of their former differences, as well as the errors of their officers which had occafioned them, were abolifhed'. The old quarrel with Flanders was revived with great heat, the king infifting that the count had infringed the last treaty; whereas the count as politively afferted, that it had been broken by the king himfelf; who, upon the count's retiring privately from Paris, and his fon's making his efcape after he was arrefted, fummoned him to abide the judgment of his peers, and he not appearing in perfon, but by deputy, the king procured a fentence, by which all his eftates were declared confifcated. This, however, was efteemed rather fevere than ftrict justice, though the king had extended the power, and raifed the credit of his parliament higher than it had ever flood in the days of his predeceffors (L). But, whatever the fentiments of the world

(L) It was to this flirring Fair, that the French owe the and active monarch Philip the fixing their parliament of Paris, which

world might be, Philip, recurring to his old object, which was re-uniting this great fief to his crown, purfued this fentence of the law with a military force, notwithstanding the interpolition of the pope, who, by his legate, cardinal Goffelin, laboured to the utmost of his power to heal this breach, and to prevent the deftruction of the count, who was rather unhappy than undutiful. After much altercation, and many propolitions made and rejected on both fides, the king took a refolution, grounded upon an opinion that the conquest was easy, to leave all things to the decision of arms. Having attembled a numerous army. commanded by himfelf, his two brothers, and his three fons, he marched directly against the Flemings; but upon new propolitions from the count, who gave holtages for the performance of them, and furrendered alfo the fortrefs of Courtray into the king's hands, he confented to a new treaty, and returned to Paris".

He takes jume aomeglic miffortunes fo much to heart that it brings him to the grave. The French finding themfelves in a manner exhaufted, and remembering the diftreffes that had been brought upon them by the laft Flemifh war, there fuddenly appeared a ftrange fpirit of difaffection through all his dominions; fo that the nobility, the clergy, and cities, in feveral provinces, entered into confederacies, to prevent the minifters from carrying their measures for levying money into execution; which affociations, when they could be no longer concealed from the king, affected him exceedingly ". To this was added a new circumfance of domeftic chagrin, that penetrated fill deeper. He had taken great care in marrying the three princes his, fons in a manner fuitable to which had before followed the perfon of the prince, and held its affemblies where he judged it most convenient. He alio erected the parliament of Thou loufe, apparently after the model of that of Paris, funce he appointed fix ecclessifical and fix lay counfellors. He fettled the court of exchequer in Normondy upon a like plan, and appointed the great days or folemn affizes at Troves in Champagne. His difference with pope Boriface the Eighth put him, by the advice of the Sieur de Marigui, upon calling what were afterwards ftylcd affemblies of the flates, in which the nobility, the clergy, and the deputies of the cities fat feparately, and framed their refpective letters to the cardinals at Rome, in which they afferted the independency of the crown, juffified the king's meafures, and appealed from the tribunal of the pope.

their birth, and great fufpicions arole of the infidelity of all their wives; upon a ftrict examination into this matter, Margaret queen of Navarre, daughter to the duke of Burgundy, and Blanch, the wife of Charles count de la Marche, appeared to be guilty, and to have lived for fome time in a fcandalous commerce with Philip and Walter de Launai, men of a noble family, but rather mean than comely in their perfons; for which commerce they were fentenced to perpetual imprifonment, and their gallants, after being flayed alive, were drawn over a field, and then hung upon a gibbet, with an ufher of the chamber, who had been privy to their amours w. The vexation of this fhameful affair, added to his former difappointments, threw the king into a wafting confumption, in which the skill of his physicians could do nothing, fo that he expired on the 29th of November, in the thirtieth year of his reign, and in the forty-feventh of his age. He was certainly, A D. 1319. to give his character in few words, a prince of great talents, great virtues, and great vices, of which the most flagrant were availice and cruelty; the confequences of which were feverely felt in his dominions long after his deceale.

There were, however, other reafons for this delay, fuch as the want of money, the treafury being in a manner empty at his father's decease; and the difcontents that reigned in feveral provinces of the kingdom, which he thought it neceffary to compole to prevent any diffurbance at that folemnity. This aim he effected by the interpolition of his uncle Charles de Valois, and the king's promifes, that the nobility fhould be reftored to the privileges they enjoyed in the reign of St. Lewis. Thefe obstacles being removed, he was crowned at Rheims, by Robert de Courtenai, archbilliop of that city r. The count de Valois, though the king was of age, had fuch an afcendancy over him, that, in effect, he governed in his name; which was the eafter for him to do, as he had a great fhare in the administration during that of his father, though perhaps it had been better for both kings if they had confided in him lefs, his hafty and pallionate difposition being the principal caufe of those different that happened both to his brother and his nephew r.

Where a king is in want of money, his government cannot long be either fleady or peaceable. Lewis was furprifed to find himfelf fo much diftreffed; he demanded the reason of it in his council, and his uncle charged it upon Enguerrand le Poitier de Marigni, a nobleman of Norman extraction, whom his father had raifed to the title of count de Longueville, to the post of chamberlain, and, in effect, to that of prime minister, by giving him the direction of the finances : he was a man of great abilities, but as warm in his temper as the count de Valois, and unable to bear this ufage after the great fervices he had done the flate; for it was chiefly through his management, that Philip the Fair had triumphed over pope Boniface, and obtained fo much from the late pope Clement V. In support, therefore, of his own conduct and character, he boldly answered, that fo much of the king's treafure as had not been fpent for his fervice, had been taken by the count de Valois himfelf. The count gave him the lye, which, with fome vehemence, Marigni retorted; fo that they were on the point of drawing their fwords in the king's prefence. The reft of the council interpoling, the count de Valois fatisfied himfelf with putting him in prifon, and caufing him to be profecuted, exhibiting against him a multitude of charges, fome of which were deflitute of all foundation, others ftrongly exaggerated, and in fome there might be truth a. He demanded time to make his defence; which was refused him, and the count had fo great influence over his judges, that they pronounced him guilty in the grofs of all that had been laid to his charge : but the king, though he might be well enough content to fee the pride of Marigni humbled, more efpecially as it afforded fatisfaction to his fubjects, yet he by no means defired his destruction, as having a great opinion of his capacity, and much regard for his fa-

The next step taken, in order to deprive him of the The fieur de king's favour and pity, was to caufe his fifter and wife to Marigni 15 be arrefted, together with the pretended magician, who, regretted by their command, as it was faid, had made images of tim of count wax of the king and his uncle, in order to deftroy them de Valois's by enchantment. He was accordingly hanged on the high gibbet at Montfaucon, fet up by his own order, that the bodies of notorious offenders might be exposed to public view. He did not fall alone ; feveral of the inferior officers in the finances were confined and put to the torture; his brother, the bishop of Beauvais, was forced to retire; and the bishop of Chalons, chancellor of France, was charged with being his accomplice, and with having poifoned his predeceffor; but being brought to a public trial, was acquitted d. this feverity was far from answering the end proposed : Marigni was confidered by the people as the victim of the count de Valois's paffion ; and that they judged right, appeared afterwards, by the king's leaving a confiderable fum of money to his children by will. The count de Valois gave largely to the poor to pray for Marigni, and for himfelf, becaufe he looked upon his being ftruck with a palfy to be a judgment from heaven, for his feverity in perfecuting this unfortunate gentleman : neither did the confifcation of his effects, and of those who were ftyled his accomplices, furnish supplies in any proportion to the king's wants, though, exclusive of what was diverted from the king's coffers, they were very confiderable °.

The coronation quickly exhaufted thefe; the propofed The king war in Flanders required new aids ; and, though Marigni makes an was in his grave, yet the fpirit he had introduced into the unfuccefscouncils of France ftill prevailed. The ministers found ful cammeans to compel the nobility to lend the king money un- Flanders, der a variety of pretences; they levied a tenth upon the and dies clergy ; they fold their liberty to the king's bondfmen, and fuddenly at when they would no longer buy, they levied the money upon them by force, and declared them free whether they would or not f. By thefe, and other practices of a like nature, an army was railed, and the king's paffion gratified, who defired, above all things, to chaftife the Flemings; or rather the haughty temper of his uncle was indulged, who managed the king fo abfolutely, that he made his own humours appear to be those of his fovereign. The pretence of this war was the breach of his treaty with king Philip, by Robert de Bethune, count of Flanders ; but Robert infifted that the French themfelves had broke it, that he had paid immenfe fums to Enguerrand de Marigni, and that he had been imposed upon and deceived in many respects . The true motive to the war was the entire conquest of Flanders, then in a very low condition, and the people harraffed by a famine. Count Robert, very fensible that he could not oppose force by force. thought it excufable to have recourse to fraud. He negotiated with all apparent figns of fubmiffion ; he confented to give hoftages, and to deliver up the fortrefs of Courtray; but, at length, the wet weather came, as he expected, and the French army, no longer able to keep the field, being obliged to retreat, he recovered Courtray by furprize h. But, whatever was the caufe, the king ended his days at the Bois de Vincennes on the 5th of June, after a reign of one year, eight months, and fix days, leaving his fubjects in great perplexity, on the fcore of the queen's being with child, and his brother Philip at a diftance (M); fo that it was doubtful whom they were to obey.

On his arrival at Paris, near a month after his brother's decease, he found things in great confusion ; but be ing fupported by the conftable the count d'Evreux, though brother to Charles de Valois, and the citizens of Paris, he compelled that ambitious prince to deliver up the Louvrc, and to fubmit their pretentions to the decifion of the court of peers, or, as it was then ftyled, the parliament, who decided, that the regency belonged of right to Philip, as first prince of the blood, to whom they granted that title and authority for eighteen years, and directed a great feal, which he was to use during that time, with this infeription: " Philip, fon of the French king, governing the realms of France and Navarre k." By this judgment the government was fettled for the prefent, and gave leifure for fetcling that of the fucceflion. The crown of France, from the time of Hugh Caper, had defcended in a lineal fuccellion from father from fon; in cafe, therefore, the queen was delivered of a prince, there could be no difpute; but if the was brought to bed of a princefs, or, if her fon flould die, then came the doubt how the crown fhould defcend, which was fo much the greater, as there was no written law to which they could have recourfe. Charles, count de la Marche, the younger brother of the regent, Charles of Valois, and Lewis of Evreux, his uncles, Eudes duke of Burgundy, and other princes of the blood, were of this opinion : but others alleged, that the bulk of the realm of France confitted of falique lands, and therefore ought to pafs by the falique law, which, excluding females, the regent Philip, as next prince of the blood, fhould inherit". In this fituation of things there was a treaty made at Vincennes, the 17th of June, by which it was flipulated, that, in cafe the queen was delivered of a princefs, the heirefs of Lewis Hutin flould have the kingdom of Navarre, and the counties of Champagne and Brie, in conjunction with her younger fifter (not yet born); that the princefs Joan fhould be bred up at the court of the duke of Burgundy, her uncle, and that neither of the princeffes fhould be married without the confent of the perfon at that time governing the realm of France, and Philip still to have the regency of Navarre and Champagne, till fuch a marriage fhould be concluded and confummated. In the courfe of his regency, he engaged in a war in fupport of his wife's mother Matilda, countefs of Artois, against count Robert, who claimed that country by defcent ". This war he conducted with fpirit and fuccefs : he obliged Robert to furrender himfelf prifoner, and to fubmit his pretentions to the decifion of rhe parliament, who gave judgment in favour of the countels, and a fatal judgment it was °. The queen, who, with difficulty, recovered of a fever, into which grief for the king her hufband had thrown her, was on the 15th of November delivered of a fon, who was baptized by the name of John, and who lived a week, or, as fome fay, three weeks, and was buried at St. Denis, being proclaimed king, as is generally faid, in the funeral fervice; but there are deeds ftill preferved which bear date in his fhort reign, fo that the modern hiftorians are justified, who put him into the lift of kings of France, by the name of John I. The old duchefs of Burgundy, the youngeft daughter of St. Lewis, and grandmother to queen Joan of Navarre, protefted by letter against this act, till the rights of that prince's fhould be examined. 'The king's brother, Charles, repaired to Rheims, but left it the very morning of the coronation, a ftep which occasioned fuch a confternation, that the gates of the city were flut till the folemnity was over 9. The new king, to prevent any difputes about his title, called a general affembly at Paris, in which his coronation was confirmed, and the nobility, prelates, and others, who affifted there, took an oath of allegiance to him and to his fon Lewis, who died, however, in a few days after ". Philip did not ftop there; he A.D. 1317. applied himfelf to pope John XXII. who wrote to the queen-dowager, and to the counts Valois and De la Marche, exhorting them not to difturb the peace of the kingdom, and, at the fame time, gave his inftructions to the archbishop of Bourges to excommunicate them if they did *. In order to put a final end to thefe difputes, Philip gave his eldeft daughter in marriage to the duke of Burgundy, and with her the county of the fame name, of which her mother was heirefs, and promifed the queen of Navarre to the fon of the count de Evreux, measures which had the effect he defired, and pacified all who had exerted themselves on the fide of the queen of Navarre. As for the count de la Marche, fince the death of the young prince Lewis, he had changed his fentiments, and highly approved the law that had been made to exclude females. because it opened him a passage to the throne.

After all, the jealoufies and grievances which had dif- New trouturbed the laft years of his father's reign were on the point bles on the of creating troubles in his. The nobility, clergy, and ci- point of breaking tizens, in feveral provinces, jealous of their refpective pri- out, which vileges, began to enter into confederacies for the fupport are preof them, which might have been fatal to the public quiet, vented by under a monarch lefs wife and lefs firm than Philip t. He the king's immediately appointed commiffaries to enquire into thefe grievances, and directed them to affure his people, that he would be as tender of giving them just occasion to take up arms, as he would be fevere in punishing those who fhould take them up without caufe. He observed that particular privileges were granted, on a fuppofition that they were not repugnant to the general welfare of the realm; and as he would opprefs none himfelf, fo he would not permit either lord, or bishop, or city, to oppress the meaneft of his fubjects. The war with the Flemings had been fufpended by a truce; and though the king was much inclined to put an end to it by a peace; yet this aim was not eafily effected, notwithstanding he had the affistance of the pope's spiritual artillery, as well as the force of his own realm ; but in the end the Flemings, being convinced of the rectitude of his intentions, compelled their count to put an end to a quarrel which had been alike burthenfome to both nations ". He fummoned Edward II. of England to render homage for the places he held in France; and though the excule that prince made would fcarce have been accepted by his predeceffors, yet, partly out of regard to his fifter whom that king had married, and partly from the confideration of his own circumftances, he received it with a good grace *. The integrity of Philip was the fource of the only objection ever made to his conduct; he had taken the crofs with his father at the council of Vienne, and he was fo strict an obferver of his word, that he made it a point of religion to prepare for a new expedition into the Holy Land, and was, with great difficulty, diffuaded from carrying it into execution while he was regent. After he alcended the throne he remained fo bent upon it. that he neglected no method of filling his coffers, and this eagernefs gained him the reputation of being covetous, and of having nothing fo much at heart as amafling money 7. The fleadiness of the king's disposition, however, would very probably have carried him through, if the pope had not interpofed; for the politics of the court of Rome were now fo much changed, and the fituation of things in Italy rendered the protection of France fo neceffary to the A.D.1321. pontiff, that he wrote to Philip, in very pathetic terms, to . defift from this enterprize for the prefent "; which letter, though it had its effect, yet he continued to look upon himfelf as bound in confcience to accomplish his vow, and

Amongst other mischiefs occasioned by this exertion, Strange there was one of a very extraor, inary nature, almost as pre- diforders in judicial to his fubjects as if the king had actually executed France, ochis defign. The Mohammedan princes in Africa, confi- a plague atdering the laft croifade of St. Lewis, and being apprehen- tributed to five that the king might revive the fame fcheme, and make poifoning the first descent in some or other of their dominions, prac- the waters. tifed with the Jews, whom his grandfather had banifhed, and his brother readmitted into France, to poifon the wells, fountains, and rivers, and offered them great fums if they would engage in this undertaking b. The Jews were afraid to embark in fo dangerous a confpiracy; and yet being loth to lofe the money, they practifed on the lepers, of whom there were great numbers then in France, and who lived by themfelves in hofpitals, very richly endowed, and who had alfo many Jews amongst them, to undertake this villainy, which they did, and were fo industrious in the performance of it, that a prodigious mortality enfued, infomuch that, if the king had perfifted in his intention, he would have found it fearce possible to have raifed an army. This confpiracy being detected, many of the lepers were burnt, and the people rifing against the Jews committed most horrid diforders, under colour of executing juffice ; fo that a greater or more univerfal calamity could not well have happened . The king had been perfuaded by the pope to fend an army into Italy, against the family of Visconti, lords of Milan, who were at the head of the Gibellines. This army was commanded by Philip, count of Mans, fon to Charles, count of Valois; but Galeas de Visconti coming to meet him with a fmall retinue, giving him good words, and proruifing to fubmit all points in difpute to the judgment of the king of France, Philip returned with his forces, without doing any thing "; which inactivity, however it might injure his reputation, was certainly without any prejudice to his country. At his return he found things in the confusion we have reprefented, the people every where highly irritated against the Jews, and the Jews protesting that they were the victims of their impatience, on account of the nation's being afflicted with a plague, which they could neither help or remove . This affair is very darkly reprefented by all, and in very different lights by fome hiftorians.

The last great action of Philip's life and reign, or at least the last great thing he attempted, was to complete what his predeceffors had begun, in reducing the money, the weights, and the measures, throughout all France, to fome fettled ftandard. He fent commissaries through all the provinces to take an exact account of the flate of things as they then flood. He began to compound with fome of the great lords, particularly the princes of the blood, for their rights of coinage within their own domains, and actually agreed with the count de Valois, and the count of Clermont and Bourbon; but found it very difficult to fucceed, notwithflanding he was at great pains to make it appear how much it was for the common benefit of his fubicets, and that it was the only effectual remedy for fome of those evils of which they had fo much complained f. But a report prevailing, that he intended to raife a tax of the fifth part of every man's revenue, in order to pay fuch individuals as would not part with their privileges, a general difcontent enfued, Philip, much affected by the misfortunes that had happened to his fubjects during his reign, and not a little chagrined to find all his ac-A.D.1322, tions minterpreted (more efpecially by the prelates, whom, from a point of confcience, he had excluded by law from fitting in parliament, becaufe it hindered their refidence in their diocefe, and prevented them from difcharging their pastoral duty s), fell fick of a fever, accompanied with a dyfentery, of which having languished five months, he breathed his last on the third of January, at the entrance . of the fixth year of his reign, and in the twenty-eighth of his age, not without great fufpicion of poifon, being hated by the clergy, and little beloved by the nobility *. He is, however, by all the French hiftorians, allowed to have been a wife, moderate, pious, just, and public-fpirited prince 1. It appeared after his deceafe, that he had been miferably cheated by those who had the direction of his finances; but it also appeared that he was very fincere in his defigns, by his appropriating in his will the fums he had faved, for the very purpofes for which he had declared they were intended. He was himfelf learned, and a great lover of learning, religious without bigotry, and fo

The next point was to get rid of his wife Blanch of Burgundy, who had been all this time prifoner in Chateau-Gaillard. For this purpofe, an application was made to the court of Rome, where the pope was fo complaifant as to declare the marriage null, for two reasons; the first was, that the lady's mother, the

The peace which had fo long fubfifted between the crowns of France and England, was interrupted by various accidents. Edward being fummoned to do homage for the territories he poffeffed in France, made the fame excufes he had formerly ufed, and might have made them with the fame fuccels; but the lord of Montpefat having built a caftle on lands which were claimed by the crown of France, was dispossefied of it by that prince's order; however, by the affiftance of the fenefchal of Guienne, it was recovered, and the French, who were in poffelion, put to the fword, as the French writers fay °. For this holtility, Edward was fummoned to the parliament to answer before Notwithstanding he fent his brother Edmund, his peers. earl of Kent, to prevent things from coming to extremity, yet the French army, under the command of Charles, count of Valois, entered the territories of Edward, and reduced the best part of them in a fort time; fo that to preferve Bourdeaux, and the few places that were left, he was forced to conclude a truce for a flort time, under colour of giving his brother leifure to recollect himfelf, and to come over and render homage in perfon P. The truth feems to he, that this war, though carried on in France, was contrived in England, to ferve the purpoles of the barons, who were then upon bad terms with the king, and the queen, who began to enter into their views, and looked upon a war with France as the only means of accomplishing them 9. This was the last campaign of the great count de Valois, who being afflicted with a grievous diftemper, the nature of which the phyficians did not understand, perfuaded himfelf it was a judgment from Heaven, for the A.D.1124. perfecution of the fieur De Marigni, whole body he cauf-

Edward of England was much at a lofs, as the queen Ifabel, the and her faction forefaw, how to adjuft his affairs in France, king's fifter, where his own prefence was abfolutely neceffary; and yet the defract to quit his kingdom was to lofe it. Upon her arrival at Paris the complained bitterly of the Spenfers, and endeavoured rather to inflame her brother Charles against her husband, than to conciliate the difputes betwixt them; but Charles, who knew that the pope and other princes had their eye upon his conduct, remonstrated to her on the impropriety of her behaviour, and that it was requisite to settle the peace before the king meddled in the matters of which the complained . The peace was accordingly regulated ; the feizure of Guienne was acknowleged to be juft, becaufe Edward had refused his homage; Charles was to name a fenefchal, and to keep pofferfion of his new conquest, but was to grant a fafe-conduct for Edward to come over; and, upon his doing him homage, was to reftore all he had taken. This agreement brought Edward into the old difficulty of leaving his regal dominions, which he was unwilling to do; and to remove this obftacle, it was propofed he fhould refign the duchy of Guienne, and the reft of his lands in France, to his fon prince Edward, whofe homage in that cafe king Charles would receive. This expedient was accepted by Edward, with a few reftrictions; fuch as, that these countries should revert to him in cafe the prince died; that his uncle flould not affien him a guardian; and that the young prince fhould not be induced to marry without his father's confent". The king thereupon fent him over, accompanied by the bifhop of Exeter, and a fuitable train; and all things being adjusted, Edward expected his queen should have returned. His expectations, however, were in vain; many of the English male contents repaired to her there, and she continued to infligate her brother against her hufband. The bishop of Exeter perceiving her drift, and that the court were no flrangers to her intrigue with Roger Mortimer, he left Paris, and fecretly returned home, difclofing all he knew to king Edward, who thereupon demanded his queen and his fon in high terms. Thefe not prevailing, hoftilities were again renewed, abundance of French fhips taken at fea, and incursions made by land in the duchy of Aquitaine w. The pope and the king of Caffile interpoling, and reprefenting to Charles that his conduct was not at all fuitable to his dignity, he forbid his fubjects to frequent his fifter's court; and at length ordered her and the prince her fon to retire out of his dominions. At the fame time, however, Robert de Artois, count of Beaumont (not without the privity of the king as is generally fuppofed), advifed her to go into Hainault, where flie concluded a marriage for ber fon with the daughter of that count, and engaged his brother to accompany her to England with a fmall force. Being, on her arrival, affifted by the malecontents, fhe quickly depofed her hufband, and raifed her fon to the throne, whom Charles would never acknowlege fo long as his father lived *.

Charles fails in his attempt to gain the German princes to elect him emperor. Let us now return to the affairs of France. At the beginning of his reign, the king, in virtue of a decifion of the parliament, had placed Lewis in the feat of his grandfather Robert de Bethune, as count of Flanders, Nevers, and Rhetel, notwithftanding the oppofition of his uncle Robert, who pretended that, being one degree nearer his father than Lewis, he ought to fucceed; and the Flemings giving him fome diffurbance, the king granted him fuch timely affiftance as prevented their breaking out into open rebellion <sup>x</sup>. He was not altogether fo fuccelsful in his attempt to fupplant Lewis of Bavaria in the empire. The pope had quarelled with this monarch, and fupported Frederick duke of Auftria, who likewife flyled himfelf emperor, and whom Lewis had defeated and then held in prifon. The fcheme of the pope was, that Charles fhould enter into a league with Leopold of Auftria. Frederick's brother, to procure that prince his liberty: that, in confideration of this affiftance, Frederick, as foon as he was fet free, flould refign his pretentions to Charles. who, upon his being acknowleged emperor by the princes of Germany, was to pay Leopold a large fum of money 2. Lewis of Bavaria fpoiled the first part of this plan, by generoufly fetting his rival at liberty, and allowing him to keep the title of emperor during life. The pope, however, kept to his defign; and Leopold of Auftria, defirous of gaining the money that had been promifed him, affured Charles, that, if he would but come to the frontiers, most of the princes of the empire would meet, receive, and elect him. The king went accordingly, with an equipage fuitable to his rank, but found nobody except Leopold, who laboured to excufe this difappointment, and engaged the pope alfo to renew the treaty: but the king was fo ashamed of what had happened, that he would not rifk a fecond difgrace, notwithstanding he had this project once exceedingly at heart, from the ambition of reftoring the diadem to France *.

Charles fought in general to be well with his neigh- He marries bours, and maintain those alliances which were most likely a third to turn to the advantage of the crown of France, in cafe time, his of any difpute. on the fcore of confanguinity, who was not fo nearly related to him . Edward II. of England being dead, he fummoned his fon Edward to do him homage for the duchy of Guienne, and the reft of his territories in France; but Edward excufed himfelf for the prefent, by alleging the unfettled flate of his affairs, and the unlucky confequences that might attend his paffing the feas. This excufe was accepted and the truce renewed, there being particular reasons why the king did not incline to excite any difputes with England, or indeed with any of his neighbours; and, amongst these, it was none of the least that his health began to decay d.

He dies after a Bort reign, and leaves his queen pregnant, which occakons a new regency.

He fhewed a great inclination to live upon good terms with the princes of the blood. Being defirous of having Clermont, which belonged to Lewis, the fon of Robert, the younger fon of St. Lewis, he gave him in exchange the county of la Marche, and fome other places, and, by letters patent, erected his barony of Bourbon into a dukedom and peerage . This was one of the last actions of his life; for his difeafe increafing, he died at Bois de Vincennes on the first of February, as he entered the feventh year of his reign, and the thirty-fourth of his A.D.1328. life, leaving his third queen big with child f. Some hiftorians fpeak of this king as a prince of a very moderate genius: it may be rather faid of a moderate disposition, for he did not want either martial courage or fteadinefs of mind, which appeared clearly in his zeal for juffice; for he called to an account the Lombards, and the other officers, who had been employed in the treasury, and had acquired immenfe fortunes by pillaging the people. One of them died under the torture, and the reft, being ftripped of their ill-got wealth, were fent home as naked as they came into France ". Charles fhewed no lefs courage on another occafion : Jourdain de Lifle, a great lord of Aquitaine, relying on his wealth, his quality, and his being allied by marriage to pope John XXII. committed innumerable infults on the laws, infomuch that he had eighteen charges against him for capital offences. This lord, being fummoned to appear before the parliament at Paris, beat out the officer's brains with his own mace; notwithftanding which outrage, he had the imprudence to go thither in a fhort time after, when the king caufed him to be arrefted,

In this monarch ended the male line of Philip the Fair, who, though he left behind him three fons at men's eftate, and confequently had the faireft hope of a numerous and lafting posterity, yet, in so short a space as fourteen years, they all deceased, and left the crown to pass into another branch of the royal family i. The Reigns of the French Monarchs of the Houfe of Valois: Philip VI. John the Good, Charles V. Charles VI. Charles VII. Levis IX. and Charles VIII.

Philip VI. or the Fortunate.

The regency claimed by king Edward IH. againfl Philip de Valois, but adjuaged to the latter.

A S, on the death of Charles the Fair, France was without a king, and as the fucceffion depended on the fex of a child unborn, there was a plain neceffity of appointing a regent. The common hiftories speak of a great contest between Philip, count de Valois, and king Edward the Third, as to their respective rights of fuccession to the crown of France; and what they fay is true in the main, but not clearly or diffinctly expressed. The difpute was, in reality, about the crown, but the claim was made only to the regency; for it was a point established, that this belonged only to the next heir; fo that declaring the regent was, in effect, declaring the next heir. Philip alleged that he was the grandfon of Philip the Hardy, the nephew of Philip the Fair, the coufin german of the deceafed king, and his nearest heir male, descended from a male, which was not contefted with him by any of the princes of the blood a. Edward, on the other hand, claimed it as being the nephew of the laft deceafed king, and confequently nearer in blood than Philip, who was but his coufin b. He admitted the general principle that females could not inherit the crown of France, for this plain reason, that otherwise the crown must have belonged of right to the princefs, of whom the queen might be brought to bed, or to the queen of Navarre, who was the daughter of Lewis Hutin; but, in admitting this principle, Edward only fet afide his mother's right to eftablish his own; for though he acknowleged females incapable, yet he infifted that the males defcending from females had a just claim . The parliament of France thought otherwife, and decided in favour of Philip, count of Valois, who thereupon affumed the title and authority of regent during the queen's pregnancy d.

All the perfecutions in the former reigns having failed Who, upon of producing any amendment in the administration of the the queen's finances, the regent thought it might contribute to his being delireputation, and bring fome wealth into the treasury, if he vered of a called Peter Remy, lord of Montigny, who had for fome is acknow. time directed thefe affairs, to an account. This flep leged and he took accordingly, and by a judgment of the parli- crowned ament, the regent himfelf prefiding, Peter was con- king. demned to be hanged, and all his goods confifcated, which, if we believe the writers of those times, amounted to one million two hundred thoufand livres, that is, about twenty millions of the prefent French money . The flates of Navarre understanding that the daughters of Philip the Long, and Edward the Third of England, as the fon of the queen's daughter, formed fome pretentions to their crown, cut that difpute fhort, by proclaiming the daughter of Lewis Hutin, and fending a deputation to invite her and her hufband, Philip, count of Evreux, to return into their dominions. A return which Philip permitted, after having engaged them to grant a kind of annuity of five thoufand livres to the daughters of Philip the Long, and to accept of an equivalent for the counties of Champagne and Brie, which, in virtue of this composition, remained annexed to the crown f. On the first of April the queen dowager was delivered of a daughter; upon which Philip immediately affumed the name of king, notwithstanding Edward the Third fent over ambaffadors to claim his right, for which feveral eminent lawyers had declared's. On the 29th of May following he was crowned at Rheims, with much folemnity. On this account he received the furname of the Fortunate, though the Flemings, who hated him for his father's fake, flyled him Philip Trouve, that is, Philip the Foundling, or the come-by-chance king. It is faid that Robert de Artois was very active in Philip's behalf; and perhaps he was, for he had married his fifter; but certainly his fervices are over-valued by fuch as attribute to his addrefs king Philip's attaining the crown h. He had the king's favour and confidence, and this created an opinion of his abilities and influence.

Amongst the great peers who affisted at the ceremony of the coronation, was Lewis, count of Flanders, who carried the fword of state, and whom his subjects had driven out of his dominions, chiefly on account of his attachment juffice and honour to reftore him; and having fpeedily affembled a very numerous army, marched directly into Flanders, accompanied by the king of Navarre, the duke of Burgundy, and the principal nobility of France i. The Flemings, though their army was inferior to that of the king, encamped on the fide of a mountain, with the town of Caffel behind them, ftrongly entrenched, and a river in their front. Philip was inclined to attack them in their camp, but the beft officers in his army diffuaded him; for that if the Flemings had remained firm to their first refolution, and acted entirely on the defensive, the king, like fome of his predeceffors would have been obliged to retire, after wafting his treafure and his army k. But, on the eve of St. Bartholomew, they attacked the king's camp with fuch intrepidity and addrefs, that they were very near becoming mafters of his perfon. Philip, however, behaved with great courage; and having given time for his troops to recollect themfelves, attacked the Flemings in their turn, with fuch fpirit, that they were entirely defeated . The lofs of this battle was the lofs of Flanders; for the king becoming mafter of Caffel, burning it to the ground, and threatening every place that made reliftance with the fame fate, carried all before him, reftored the count, and left the Flemings humbled by his power, but without any relaxation of their hatred to his A.D 1328. perfon m. At his return to Paris, he fummoned king Edward to do him homage, and, receiving no fatisfactory anfwer, feized his revenues in France ". In regard to the fervices rendered by Robert de Artois in the war of Flanders, the king erected his county of Beaumont le Roger into a peerage; fo that at this time he was confidered as a favourite declared.

Next year Edward the Third of England thought fit to pafs the fea, and, having landed at Bologne, repaired to Amiens with a numerous retinue; where he was very kindly received by Philip, who had with him the kings of Navarre, Bohemia, and Majorca. Great disputes arose about the nature of the homage which the king was to pay; that is, whether it was liege or fimple; the former including fervices, and an oath of fealty, the latter being no more than an acknowlegement that the countries for which homage were done were fiefs dependent on the crown of France: belides Edward infifted that fatisfaction flould be given him for the lands that had been taken from the duchy of Guienne before he did homage. Philip, defirous of having this matter adjusted, confented that Edward fhould render him homage in general terms, and fhould take time to examine his own archives, and from thence determine which fpecies of homage was due : and as to the difpute concerning the lands in Guienne he was to have his action before the parliament °. Upon thefe terms Edward did homage in the cathedral church of Amiens, on the 6th of June, and returned very foon after to England P. Philip acted in this whole affair with great caution and prudence; he knew that the homage due to him was liege; but confidering that the king must then have appeared bare-headed, without arms or fpurs, and have taken his oath upon his knees, he was perfuaded that the fpirit of a young man would not let him ftoop to that humiliation; and therefore he condefcended to this expedient, that he might receive the homage in any form, referving to himfelf a right to have this afterwards explained in a manner more authentic. Edward had made a protestation before a notary at London, that, whatfoever he did, he did by compulfion, and through fear of lofing his lands, and that therefore it should be no prejudice to his just rights. The A.D.1329. fame year king Philip determined a difpute concerning ec- clefiaftical and lay jurifdictions, in favour of the clergy, who held themfelves fo much obliged thereby, that they fet up his statue, and gave him the title of catholic 9

What particularly determined Edward to this measure was a new disturbance in the duchy of Guienne, the inhabitants of which, believing they fhould have been fupported from England, made fome incursions into France; upon which king Philip fent his brother Charles duke of Alençon into

Edward concluded from hence, that, if he refused the fatisfaction defired, he fhould be ftripped of all his dominions in France, before he was in a capacity to defend them *. In the fummer he came over into this kingdom, demanded reflitution of what had been taken from him, and feemed difpofed to live upon good terms with the king; which being all that Philip defired, he treated him with all poffible refpect, and gave him the fatisfaction he demanded. Here the French writers feem to think the difputes between thefe princes had ended; for though they did not love, they effeemed each other highly, and had great apprehenfions of the reciprocal diffurbances that each might create in the other's dominions, which made them willing to avoid a rupture, as being inconvenient to either in the prefent state of their affairs'. This difpolition, however, was quickly altered, by means of a certain incendiary, whole private interest, or rather whole violent refentment, induced him to leave no means untried to infpire Edward with an implacable averfion againft Philip; in which aim he fucceeded, and involved the two nations in a war, the most fatal and bloody that almost any history A.D.1330. records, and which more than once brought the kingdom of France to the very brink of destruction ".

This incendiary was Robert de Artois, who being a of the par- prince of the blood of France, having married the king's fifter, and having ferved him with great vigour and valour in the cabinet and in the field, thought his fervices could never be paid, and that Philip was bound to accomplish for who there- him whatever he defired, in whatever manner, and by reapon retires moving whatever obstacles lay in the way ". He began by prefenting a memorial when king Edward was at Amiens, defiring leave to examine witneffes in regard to his just claim to the county of Artois, which was granted. He next demanded a revision of the judgment given by parliament in that caufe, on a fuggestion that he could exhibit new proofs, which were abfolutely conclusive. He was indulged in this too, and the fuit was reduced to the fame fate in which it flood before either of the two judgments was pronounced *. He then produced thefe evidences, which, upon infpection, were found to be forged. The very woman, by whofe contrivance this whole fcene was carried on, being feized, confessed the facts, and made every thing as clear as poffible. The king laboured as much as was in his power to prevail upon his brother-in-law to defift from these pretentions, and to have nothing farther to do with those whom he had engaged in these practices. He promiled to defift, but ftill perfevered ; fo that, the king provoked by thefe and fome more criminal practices, after granting him various delays of justice, at length, in full parliament, pronounced an edict of banifhment, and confifcation of all his effates y. He retired into the territories of the duke of Brabant, where he engaged in new intrigues; and Philip, having thereupon taken measures for humbling the duke of Brabant, and having caufed his own fifter, for the fhare fhe had in her hufband's finister contrivances, to be arrefted, Robert de Artois withdrew, in the difguife of a merchant, with all the wealth he had amaffed, into England, where he was kindly received by Edward, as well A.D. 1311. in regard to the fervices he was able to render him, as in refentment to the protection afforded by Philip to David king of Scots; who, though his own brother-in-law, Edward had dispossessed of his dominions. Many of the French historians, and amongst these some of great note, have confidered Philip's proceedings against Robert as flowing from a fpirit of implacable perfecution 2; whereas others, by producing the original procefs, bave vindicated the king's conduct, and thewn, that if he had followed the advice of his parliament, in feizing the perfon of Robert, he might eafily have prevented the mifchiefs to which he was exposed, by fuffering him to retire and feek fielter amongft his enemies 2. But with regard to Edward's creating him earl of Richmond, though affirmed by fome good authors, it is certainly a miftake b.

Philip had lived upon exceeding good terms with pope John the Twenty-fecond, who feemed to be very defirous Edward of establishing a new croifade; in which, to shew his obe- both predience, and at the fame time to answer other purpoles of pare for his own, Philip shewed himself very zealous, and, with war, the the kings of Arragon, Naples, and Bohemia, took the fecrally, crofs, though it has been very much doubted, whether he various was at all in earnest in regard to this expedition . ling a great fleet; and this defign afforded a fair pretence for levving large fums upon the clergy and laity, at the fame time it gave a colour for negociating on every fide, which was of more confequence than all the reft; it gave occasion to the pope to interpole with the king of England, and to proteft, according to the doctrine of those times, against making any attempts on the dominions of a prince, who had taken a vow to employ his arms in defence of the gospel against the infidels. On the other hand, Edward, though fcarce of full age, managed his affairs with great temper and addrefs; he had nothing fo much at heart as maintaining what he took to be 2 good title to the crown of France, and at the fame time there was nothing of which he was fo much afraid as of the lofs of the duchy of Guienne, and the county of Ponthieu, before he was in a condition to profecute that title. The first thing he aimed at wasfubduing Scotland; yet he did not make war directly upon king David Bruce, but fuffered fuch of his nobility as were inclined to affift Edward Baliol to invade Scotland; where they gained great advantages, and, under pretence of giving the Scotsa new king, reduced the whole kingdom to mifery<sup>d</sup>. As foon as the four years truce was at an end, he marched into Scotland in perfon, and traverfed it from fouth to north, penetrating at length as far as Caithnefs. Philip, to favour his allies, fuffered fome irruptions into Guienne, and at the fame time made fresh complaints at Avignon to pope Benedict, who had fucceeded John. Edward fent his ambaffadors alfo to the pontiff; offered to fubmit the differences between them to his decifion; profeffed his inclination to go alfo into the Holy Land with Philip, and to leave all things in their prefent fituation, till their return °. He fent his ambaffadors likewife to the court of France; where they complained of the injuries done him; folicited redrefs in the moft refpectful terms; and affured Philip, that king Edward had nothing fo much at heart as preferving the peace between the two nations. A.D.1337. But at the fame time he treated with the emperor Lewis of Bavaria, with the count of Holland and Zealand; with the count palatine of the Rhine, and other princes of Germany; and made no fecret to them of his intention to attack France, not barely about the wrongs he had fuftained in Guienne, but in support of his right to the crown of that realm, which Robert of Artois perfuaded him was indubitable. This man had fo high an idea of his own

King Philip being informed of thefe negociations, and perceiving clearly that the pretence of taking the crofs was no longer of any ufe, detached a fquadron of his fleet against the infidels, and brought the reft, confifting chiefly of ward pre-Genoefe veffels, into the ocean; where they might be employed against the English 8. He made alliances likewife with the princes on his frontiers, particularly the king of truce. Navarre; and on the fide of Germany he brought into his interest John of Luxemburgh, king of Bohemia, the dukes of Auftria, and feveral great prelates and peers of the empire. In a difpute of this nature it was of great confequence which fide was taken by the Flemings. Their Count Lewis declared wi hout referve for king Philip, but his fubjects were much more inclined to Edward. James Artevelle, a brewer, the most able and the most artful man in that country, governed them as much as if he had been their prince, and the advantages derived from the English commerce determined him in favour of Edward; who, at his requeft, paffed the fea with a great navy, and landed a numerous army at Sluys h. In the first councils that were held, it was refolved to act offenfively, but for this conduct there wanted a pretence; the vaffals of the empire could not act either by the orders, or even as allies of Edward, without direction from the emperor, and he was under a treaty with France. This difficulty, however, was foon overcome; the French had made themfelves mafters of Cambray; the emperor refolved it should be retaken; and, for this purpofe, he created Edward vicar general of the empire, who belieged it without delay, though John duke of Normandy, king Philip's fon, defended it with a numerous garrifon. Yet, after a fhort time, Robert de Artois prevailed upon him to raife the fiege, and march into Picardy i. Philip covered his country on that fide like a captain of great experience, and declined coming to a battle, though fome writers alcribe this conduct to Edward. However, the feat of war was again transferred into the Low Countries, where Edward, with his forces, befieged Tournay; to the relief of which

The countefs dowager of Hainalt, fifter to Philip, mother-in-law to Edward, and fifter-in-law to Robert de Artois, coming out of the convent to which the had retired, interpofed with fo much fpirit and addrefs, that fhe engaged all parties to agree to a truce for a yeark; and might, perhaps, have brought about a peace if the had furvived.

During these transactions fome great things were alfo performed by fea. The French fleet, or rather the fleet in the pay of France, took two thirs of force, and many trading veffels; committed great depredations on the coafts; burnt the town of Southampton, and attempted defcents in feveral places; and, notwithstanding they were at length repulsed, did a great deal of mischief1. But king Edward, in his paffage to Flanders, met with this fleet at fea, engaged and defeated it after a very obstinate refistance. This was the first great maritime action that happened in the courfe of the war, and coft both parties very dear; the greatest part of king Philip's fleet was deftroyed, and near twenty thousand men perished; on the other fide, the English had about feven thousand men killed, and their fleet fo roughly handled as to be able to perform nothing of confequence that year. Philip, following the example of his predeceffors, profecuted Edward as a peer of France before the parliament, for receiving and fupporting Robert de Artois, after he had been condemned for treason, and for this crime directed the duchy of Guienneand the county of Ponthieu to be feized; in purfuance of which conduct many places were taken, till the war on all fides was fuspended by a truce". At the fiege of Tournay, Edward first took the arms, and affumed publicly the title of king of France, and the Flemings did homage to him as their monarch, that they might avoid the imputation of rebellion, and the forfeiture of two millions of florins, which they flood bound to pay the pope upon their laft A.D.1 340. treaty with Philip, in cafe they at any time revolted against - the crown of France; which penalty they conceived to be eluded by their owning Edward's title, and acting against Philip as the ufurper of that realm from the right heir ". Yet, upon the truce, they admitted the return of their

A new and unlooked for incident revived the war even Diffute before the conclusion of the truce, and fpread its flames about the before the conclution of the truce, and pread its futures fuccifion to much wider than ever. Arthur the fecond duke of Bre-Bretagne, tagne, prince of the blood, and peer of France, had, by reviews the Mary, daughter of the vifcount de Limoges, three fons, war bijore John, Guy, and Peter. The eldeft and the youngeft of his fons, of the firft bed, lived and died without iffue; but Guy, count de Penthievre, left behind him an only daughter, who, from an accident that befel her while a child, was called Hopping Jane. Her uncle John, the third duke of Bretagne, would have regarded her as his heirefs, having an implacable averfion to his mother-in-law, and his brother John, count de Montfort P. After contriving various methods to defeat him of his fucceffion, the duke at laft gave his niece in marriage to Charles de Chatillon, second fon to the Count de Blois, by the fifter of king Philip, whom the French hiftorians generally call Charles de Blois 9; and to whom, in conjunction with, and in right of his wife, duke John caufed the flates of Bretagne to fwear homage, not doubting that, after his deceafe, the king would fupport his nephew's title, which was the princi-pal motive to the marriage. This duke dying in the month of April, John count de Montfort, in right of his mother, A.D.134. immediately feized his palace and treafures, which quickly enabled him to make himfelf mafter of all the ftrong places in the duchy '. As he knew the difposition of the king and court of France, he had very little hopes of remaining long quiet; and therefore, to fecure himfelf a protection equal to that on which his competitor depended, he went over to England, and offered to do homage to king Edward, either as king of France, on whom it depended by the new creation, or as king of England, fince in quality of duke of Normandy, which he claimed independent of his right to the crown of France, Bretagne depended anciently on him, and was but a remote fief of the crown of France. Edward entertained him kindly, received his homage, promifed him fupport, and fent him back to Bretagne 3. On the other hand, Philip caufed him to be fummoned to answer for his conduct before the high court of parliament, and probably granted him a fafe-conduct ; for he wont to Paris, made his excuses to the king, and remained there fome time; but fufpecting a defign to fecure his perfon, he withdrew fecreily, and retired into his own country. The parliament proceeded however, and at length declared the right of fuccession belonged to the countefs de Penthievre, and the king ordered his fon John, duke of Normandy, to put that lady and her hufband into poffeffion of the duchy of Bretagne . John de Montfort exclaimed againft this fentence as unjust, and as given at the folicitation and out of complaifance to the king; in which complaint there feems to be fome foundation, fince he was brother to the deceafed duke, and confequently nearer in blood than his niece, and heir male, and therefore to be preferred to a female: and it was not a little ftrange, that he, who was capable of taking the crown of France by defcent, fhould have no title by the fame defcent to a fief of that crown ".

The war of Bretagne feemed to be determined almost as foon as it began; for the duke of Normandy entering that duchy with a numerous army, John de Montfort threw himfelf into Nantes, and made all the difpolitions requifite for an obftinate defence; but the duke having corrupted one of his officers, the place was betrayed into his hands, together with the perfon of John de Montfort, who was fent prifoner to Paris, and confined in the tower of the Louvre w. His competitor Charles de Blois marched with a confiderable force to befiege her in Hennebon; upon which fhe fent Amaure de Cliffon into England to folicit fuccours from king Edward, and with him the young prince her fon, that he might be fafe. reduction of the place as a certain prelude to the concucit of Bretagne, pufhed the fiege with all the warmth imaginable, and was on the very point of taking Hennebon, and the duchefs, when the English fuccours arrived, under the command of Walter de Mauny, an excellent officer; who, with a handful of troops did all that could be expected from him; but would have probably been opprefied by numbers, if the countefs had not very artfully procured a truce. This gave her an opportunity of going over in perfon to England; where, the truce between the two crowns being expired, the procured a powerful fuccour, commanded by Robert de Artois, with whom the embarked on board a fleet of forty-five fail. In their paffage, they met and attacked the French fleet, commanded by Lewis de la Cerda, whom the historians of those times call Lewis of Spain, but they were feparated by a florm *. On their arrival in Bretagne, the war revived with great fpi- A.D. 242rit, in which, as in the fight at fea, the duchefs act d in perfon. Robert de Artois made himfelf master of Vannes, which was foon after retaken by the French, and Robert de Artois, with much difficulty, made his efcape. The wounds he received proving dangerous, he embarked for England, where he died about the middle of October, and was buried with great folemnity at Canterbury: a very fortunate event for king Philip, which affected Edward fo much, that he refolved to go over in perfon to Bretagne to revenge it. This refolution he executed accordingly with a greater force than had been hitberto employed on that fide.

An eagerness to perform fomething very extraordinary prevented him from doing at all what he thought to have ward, afdone at once; for perceiving there was no confiderable ter an unarmy in the field to oppose him, he laid fiege to Nantes, fuccessful Rennes, Vannes, and Guignan, at the fame time. The campaign duke of Normandy, who knew those places were well tagne, provided, made no great hafte to fuccour them, that the makes a English army might be harraffed by the fatigue of those paeifica. fieges, and that he might have time to augment his own y. tion. At length, hearing that Edward had taken Guignan, he marched towards Rennes; and, the enemy having raifed the fiege, he proceeded to Nantes, the fiege of which was likewife raifed at his approach. formed a blockade at a great diftance ; and, though Edward took every method he could devife to provoke him. vet he continued still in the fame fituation, till, by the interpolition of the new pope Clement the Sixth, a truce was concluded, and Edward returned into England with lefs advantage than from any campaign he ever made 2. By this treaty John de Montfort obtained his liberty, and, though he was forbid to leave Paris, yet he took the first opportunity of leaving it privately, and returning again to Bretagne. As for the conferences held at Avignon, in the prefence of the pope, they were far from advancing the peace, but they had this good confequence, that the truce was prolonged for three years, and this for France and England, as well as Bretagne, Scotland, Guienne, and the Low Countries, the allies on both fides being included a.

King Philip, by an act of feweruy, affords Edward an opportunity to declare word the truce.

It feems to have been the view of Philip, in concluding the first truce, to make way, if possible, for a peace; for though hitherto his loffes had not been great, yet he found that Edward had fo many advantages, and was fo capable of improving them, that he would willingly have ended it; but finding it was not in his power, he applied himfelf to ftrengthen the alliances he had already formed, and to make fuch acquifitions as might prove beneficial to his family. He met with fome fuccefs in the former fcheme; and more especially in the promise of naval affistance from Spain, and much greater in the latter, by his treaty with Humbert the Second, dauphin of Viennois, of which we shall have occasion to speak more largely hereafter, and by the purchafe of the lordship of Montpellier, from the unfortunate king of Majorca, of which we have already given an account in its proper place. He might have done more in reference to both, if the war had not broke out fooner, and with greater violence than ever, by a breach of the truce, as fome writers fay, on the part of king Edward; but, in reality, from an inexcufable act of cruelty, flowing from that impetuolity of temper which was the great fource of all Philip's misfortunes. He had concluded a marriage between his fecond fon Philip, duke of Orleans, and the princefs Blanch, the daughter of his predeceffor Charles the Fair; and to heighten the folemnity of the wedding, had appointed a tournament b. the faith of the truce, Oliver de Cliffon, who had ferved with reputation on the fide of Charles de Blois, had been made prifoner by the English, and been exchanged for an English earl, came to Paris, with feveral other gentlemen of Bretagne, to fhare in these diversions. Soon after their arrival, the king caufed Cliffon and eleven more to be arrefted, upon fome fuspicion that they held intelligence with John de Montfort, or with king Edward, and, without any form of law, caufed them to be beheaded in prifon. As the blood of the nobility had hitherto been facred in France, this act of violence excited terror and icaloufy amongst them, and struck all the kingdom with consternation . When the news of it came to Edward, he was fo incenfed, that he was on the point of putting all the French prifoners in his hands to death ; but Henry of Lancafter, earl of Derby, diffuaded him, by faying, that it was not the way to efface a bad precedent by making a worfe : upon which the king fent for Henry de Leon, and told him, that though he might as well put him to death as Philip had facrificed his countrymen, or infift upon a very A.D. 1345. large ranfom, as he was the richeft gentleman in Bretagne. yet he would be content with a very fmall one, if he would go to Paris, and, in his name, defy Philip de Valois; tell him, that he looked upon the truce as no longer fubfifting, and that he would never conclude another till he had revenged the death of these unhappy gentlemen d.

The first efforts were made in Guienne, to which the carl of Derby was fent with a ftrong fquadron, and a numerous corps of troops on board. He managed the war the war with great fuccefs, and defeated the count de Lifle, who are rather commanded for king Philip on that fide. John de Mont- favourable fort difplayed his banners again as duke of Bretagne, and, with the affiftance of fome English troops, belieged Quimper; but the place was fo ftrongly fortified and fo well defended, and his own troops in to poor a condition and fo ill provided, that he was conftrained to raife the fiege; the difgrace of which affected him fo ftrongly, that he died foon after of difcontent, leaving his fon a kind of holtage in England, and his broken fortune to the care of that heroine his fpoufe f. In Flanders things took the like turn ; king Edward not only went thither, but carried with him alfo his fon, afterwards the famous Black Prince, in house that, through the intereft of his friend Artevelle, for fo Edward always called him, the Flemings might be induced to leave their natural prince, and accept either of him or his fon. His agent did all that was in his power, but in vain; the propolition was rejected, and the commons of Ghent entertaining fome fufpicion of Arevelle, who remained behind, the reft of their deputies raifed a tumult on his return, and beat out his brains 3. Thus far things went well for king Philip, even without his own affistance; but the earl of Derby was still victorious in Guienne, and pufhed his conquefts as far as Angoulefme. The king ordered his fon, the duke of Normandy, to march against him; but was unable to provide him with a competent army, for want of money. He had forefeen this want, but did not think it would fo foon have come upon him. He had, however, endeavoured to provide against it, by impoling that tax upon falt which fill fublits ". This furnished him with money indeed ; but it came in flowly, and was attended with feveral infurrections and univerfal difcontent. At length the duke of Normandy marched with a hundred thousand men against the carl of Derby, who had not a third part of that number ; recovered most of the new conquests; and, by degrees, prefied him fo hard, that he was forced to fend to king Edward and demand relief, without which it was impoffible to fave Guienne, which the war had already almost ruined i.

Philed meditates the England.

King Philip, having exerted his utmost force in affembling and completing the army of the duke of Normandy, invation of relied upon that for relifting the English under the earl of Derby, now by his father's death become earl of Lancaster, even when they fhould be augmented by the troops which he knew king Edward was bringing thither in perfon. He therefore meditated an invation on England, in the king's abfence, which was to be facilitated by an irruption of the Scots; and with this view he had a great number of Genoefe veffels in his ports, and fome thoufands of crofsbowmen, who were to embark as foon as the king had appointed a place for his fleet to affemble. He had alfo fet on foot a fresh negociation with the Flemings, and had made them very confiderable offers, if they would return to their allegiance k. While he was using the propereft means to carry thefe important projects into execution. Edward, having drawn together four thousand men at arms, ten thousand archers, twelve thousand Welch, and fix thousand Irish foot, embarked them on board cight hundred transports, and, efcorting these with a fleet of two hundred and fifty fail, embarked in perfon on the 4th of July, with an intention to land either at Bayonne or Bourdeaux; but being twice drove back by contrary winds, which threw him, with no fmall hazard, on the coaft of Cornwall, he began to liften to the advice of Geoffrey, brother to the count de Harcourt 1. This gentleman had not only been of the council, but was alfo a declared favourite to king Philip, till, by fuch degrees that are but too common at courts, he was difgraced. Knowing the violence of his mafter's temper, he fled about two years before into England, where he was very kindly received, and much efteemed by Edward. This Geoffrey had, from the beginning, remonstrated to him, that Guienne and Poitou were in themfelves countries not over fruitful, and by this time wholly exhausted, having been fo long the feat of war; whereas Normandy (which was his own country) was very rich and fruitful, full of large towns, indifferently fortified, and where, on account of taxes which they thought illegal, and for various other reafons, the gentlemen were highly difgufted with Philip and his government. Edward finding that he could not execute his own purpofe, very wifely altered it, and, directing his courfe to the opposite shore, landed his troops at La Hogue. He there divided his forces into three bodies, commanded by himfelf, the earl of Warwick, and Geoffrey Harcourt, with which he fpread defolation on every fide : Carentan, St. Lo, and Velonge, were taken fword in hand, and pillaged: Rouen, better fortified, might have efcaped; but the count d'Eu and the earl of Tancarville having retired thither with the militia of the adjacent country, the townfmen would needs have them give the English battle; which they being perfuaded, or rather compelled to do, were not only defeated, but driven into the town : the place was taken, with the conftable and the count, a prodigious flaughter, and an immenfe booty. Edward then advanced up the Seine as high as Poilli, within lefs than twenty miles of Paris, from whence he fent to challenge Philip either to a battle or fingle combat; and, receiving no anfwer, retired into his own county of Ponthieu, in order to refresh and recruit his army, being now inclined to march into Flanders, having received fresh invitations from the Flemings.

Many of his allies, and most of his great vaffals, having joined king Philip, the fight of fo numerous an army, and fuch a croud of nobility, induced that prince to hope, that, in the first transport of their resentment, they might overwhelm the reduced army of his antagonist. Full of this idea, he followed the English with all possible diligence. King Edward, who had now in view a retreat into Flanders, directed his march towards the river Somme, in order to pafs into Artois; but found it fo well guarded, that it was impoffible : upon this, he ordered proclamation to be made amongst his prifoners, of whom he had fifteen or fixteen thousand, that, if any of them could shew him a ford, he would give him his liberty, with that of twenty more. and a fum of money into the bargain. One of the prifoners accepted the propofal, and led him to the ford of Blanquetaque; where the English passed in spite of the opposition given them by fix hundred crofs-bows, and the like number of horfe, on the other fide; and having reached the village of Creffy, four leagues beyond Abbeville, encamped in the neighbourhood. King Philip paffed the fame night in the last mentioned town, and in the morning continued the purfuit, not with that leifure and prudence which he had fhewn upon other occasions, but like a man led by his paffions, who meafured the glory of his victory by the number of the flain.

The famous battle of Circfly, in Ponchieu.

He came up with the Englih about four in the afternoon, and a battle enfuing, was defeated with great flaughter ". The next day's lofs was little, if at all, inferior to this; for a vaft body of militia from all the adjacent countries, marching in order to join the king's army, fell in unexpectedly with a body of Englifh troops, and, being eafily routed, were most of them put to the fword. The king, who behaved very gallantly himfelf, and was carried from the battle by force, fent for the duke of Normandy, to join the remains of his army, while the victorious Edward continued his march to the fca, and clofed the campaign by investing Calais", as a place very commodious for his defigns.

The town of Calais was obfinately defended by its inhabitants, a circumftance which obliged Edward to fortify his camp, and to-take great precautions for the continu- Tleimborance of the fiege : in the mean time king Philip, being lant youn joined by his ion the duke of Normandy, and having of atals is drawn forces from every part of his dominions, took the Laward, oriflame from the abby of St. Denis, and, with an army of one hundred thousand men, marched to the place befieged. When he arrived at a convenient diftance, he difpatched fome officers, with orders to view the enemy's camp, who found it covered by a ftrong regular line, within which were warm convenient huts for the foldiers. places of arms at proper diftances, and convenient markets, in which all forts of neceffaries were fold at an eafy price °. They offered him battle in the name of king Philip; to which he answered coolly, that he did not mean to give him battle, but to take Calais; and, at their return, they reported the English to be fo well posted, that it would be great imprudence to venture an attack. Philip carried his point in regard to the young count of Flanders, whom his fubjects invited home, received him with great affection, and would have married him to the princefs Ifabella, daughter to king Edward ; but he, deceiving A.D. 1147. them, efcaped to Paris, where, by the advice of king Philip, he efpoufed Margaret, daughter to the duke of Brabant P. This, though a point of confequence, afforded but very little confolation for the lofs of Calais; which, after it held out near a year, furrendered on terms which only high refertment could impose, or the deepest necesfity admit. Six of the principal inhabitants were to be given up to Edward, who declared his intention to pit them to death. This treaty must have been ineffectual, if fix of the chief burghers had not offered themfelves, and went out in their fhirts, with halters about their necks, to throw themfelves at Edward's feet, who fternly ordered their execution; from which they were, with difficulty, faved by the queen, upon condition they left the place, and never returned any more. They were honourably received, and amply provided for by king Philip . Edward, once mafter of the place, turned out all the inhabitants, and replaced them by his own fubjects. The war was not more fortunate for Philip on any fide. In Guienne, the earl of Lancafter not only recovered whatever places the duke of Normandy had taken, but added also to his conquefts the port of St. John d'Angeli, Poitiers, Niort, and Xaintes . The widow of John de Montfort defeated Charles de Blois in Bretagne, and made him prifoner, with his two fons; and, while her confort befieged Calais, the queen of England defeated the Scots, and took David Bruce their king s. Things were in this ftate when a legate from the pope interposed, to the no small fatisfaction of Philip; and Edward, knowing the diforder of his finances, readily yielded to a truce, which he afterwards prolonged for three years t.

The return of peace could not but be welcome to a nation in the most diffrested condition. All the country from Paris to the fea was laid defolate and wafte, and beyond nexed to the the Loire all was in the fame condition. A famine fucceeded to the war, and to that a plague, which fwept away multitudes; but this vifitation was not peculiar to France, having ravaged Afia and Italy before, and continued its deadly progrefs to the very extremities of Europe ". His misfortunes foftened the heart of Philip, fo that, when Geoffrey de Harcourt threw himfelf at his feet, with a fcarf about his neck, in the form of a cord, he raifed him up with great kindnefs, and forgave him. An attempt made upon Calais, though without the king's knowlege, might eafily have revived the war; but king Edward going thither in perfon, and making prifoners all who were embarked in that expedition, whom he ranfomed at a high rate, and Philip difavowing the act, the truce fublifted as if no fuch thing had happened ". The dauphin of Viennois, notwithstanding repeated ceffions of his eftates, in cafe he died without heirs, after the death of his first wife, was inclined to marry; and having cast his eyes upon Joan, daughter to the duke of Bourbon, Philip, whofe talent was negociation, prevented that - match, by interpoling his grandfon Charles, who espouled the lady. The dauphin, who was of a foft and pliant temper, refolved to quit the world, to take the order of St. Dominick, and at the fame time relinquish his territories to Charles, the first of the blood royal of France, who bore the title of dauphin *. Thefe marriages occasioned great rejoicings, which, however, were of no long continuance; for his young queen, who was fcarce feventeen, became a widow in lefs than a year, the king dying of a fhort illnefs at Chartres en Beauce, on the 22d of August, in the twenty-third year of his reign, and the fifty-feventh of his life, leaving the queen with child. His misfortunes, joined to the haftinefs of A.D. 13001 his temper, made him little regretted, more especially as an opinion prevailed, that his perfon was unlucky, notwithftanding the furname of Fortunate, which he acquired at his accession to the throne 2.

prifoner by the English in Normandy, under colour of procuring money to pay his ranfom, which had been fixed at fo large a fum as eighty thousand crowns °. Being at this time in Paris, the king caufed him to be arrefled, and three days after beheaded, without any trial, in the prefence of the duke of Bourbon, and fome other lords. It was given out, that, at his death, he confeffed his having entered into engagements with king Edward. The crime charged upon him was, that he had confented to let that monarch have his county of Guines; which, lying in the neighbourhood of Calais, was at that juncture of the utmost importance; and to excuse the manner of his punifiment, it was alleged, that, from the examples of Robert de Artois and Geoffrey de Harcourt, the king had reafon to fecure himfelf against the confequences of a third inflance of the like kind. But this excufe did not fatisfy the nobility, who looked upon the action with horror, and were terrified with the apprehenfion of fuch a precedent. Their apprchenfions were not at all leffened by the manner in which the king difpofed of the eftates of the deceafed. The conflable's fword he beftowed on Charles de la Cerda, great grandfon to Alonfo the Wife, by the father's fide, and flanding in the fame degree of relation to St. Lewis by L's mother : the county of Eu he gave to John de Artois, the fon of Robert; but, though both were his near relations, neither had merited any thing of the flate, but derived these benefits purely from the king's favour P. The county of Guines was left to the daughter of the deceafed, who espoused Walter de Brienne, titular duke of Athens, who, in process of time, became also constable of France. The king being very fenfible of the uneafinefs of the barous and the nobleffe, endeavoured to diffipate their fears by a great variety of court diversions, and inflituted the order of the Star 9, that he might attach a confiderable number of them to his perfon; which, though it had fome effect, did not answer his intentions in any great degree. The inftitution of the Garter by Edward produced this project.

tune in the blockade of St. John de Angeli, which, though a fea-port, furrendered for want of provision'. On the other hand, Sir Aumary de Pavia, who was still governor of Calais, corrupted the officer who commanded in Guines, and fo took it, as if by furprize. As this blow was felt, king John complained that the truce was violated ; but Edward vindicated himfelf, by faying that he had looked upon the truce as a kind of merchandize, of which both were to make use; and that as John had got a port on one fide, he had borrowed a fortress on the other s. Sir Aumary, who, though very brave, was an abfolute knave, encouraged by this fuccefs, attempted to furprife St. Omers, in which Geoffrey Charni commanded; but he gave him fo warm a reception, that, after an obftinate and bloody difpute, his troops being defeated, he was, by an unlucky fall from his horfe, taken prifoner; and, in return for his having cheated Geoffrey of twenty thousand crowns for the fale of Calais, where he was alfo taken prifoner, and forced to pay a great ranfom, he now caufed A.D. 1351-Sir Aumary to be tore to pieces with wild horfes '. In Bretagne the war was carried on with more heat than ever between the houfes of Montfort and Blois. In fhort, every thing tended to an open revival of the war, as foon as both parties fhould have recruited their forces, in which view John had fome advantage, as his brother-in-law, Charles of Luxemburgh, was become emperor ". Next year the truce was again renewed. At this time Charles, king of Navarre, having taken poffeffion of his dominions, returned to the French court, where he was bred, and where he was admired and beloved, as one of the most gallant and accomplifhed princes of that age. At first he affected entirely the character of a man of pleafure, which he found to be most acceptable at court ; and having by thefe means rendered himfelf wonderfully agreeable to the queens, for there were then three, he carried his first point of marrying the princefs Joan, the king's daughter, without difficulty ". He then complained that the county of Angoulefine, being ruined by the war, it was but just that the lofs he fultained thereby fhould be repaired; and feveral placesbeing beftowed upon him in Normandy, the king gave that county to his favourite the conftable Charles of Spain, a donation which fo provoked the king of Navarre, who was defirous of keeping that domain, that he caufed

Though he fubmitted in perfon to a kind of conviction before the parliament of Paris. yet it was upon an affurance of having his pardon, and, which is much more extraordinary, having king John's fecond fon delivered him as a hoftage till the ceremony of his difmiffion fhould be over; a conceffion which ferved only to debafe the king, to heighten the ambition of Charles, and to augment his party x.

In another place we have given the character of this prince, whom the French ftyle Charles the Wicked, and who was indeed one of the most dangerous enemies the king or kingdom ever had. It fhall fuffice, therefore, here to obferve, that, exclusive of that title which, in his mother's right (the daughter of king Lewis Hutin), Charles thought he had to all; he also pretended to the duchy of Burgundy, the counties of Champagne and Brie, with fome other places, which had belonged to fome or other of his anceftors y. His method was to advance his pretenfions fingly and feparately; and as foon as he had obtained an equivalent for one, he fet up another, at the fame time treating with the English, and with fuch as, from particular prejudices, were become malecontents 2. The king, being acquainted with these practices, bestowed the duchy of Normandy upon his fon the dauphin, and or-A.D.1354. dered him to feize the king of Navarre's eftates. This ftep brought Charles out of his regal dominions by fea, where he quickly became fo troublefome, that the crown was forced to purchase quiet at the expence of one hundred thousand crowns; notwithstanding which gratification, he ftill kept up an intelligence with England, and was the only perfon confided in by the malecontents a.

King Edward palles over to Calais, and returns without doing any thing more than ruinng the country.

A flrong defire in king John to recover the important fortrefs of Calais, and the well-grounded opinion which Edward entertained, that there never was a more favourable opportunity for extending his conquefts, induced both princes to fufpend negotiation, and to refer their quarrel once more to the fword. Edward the Black Prince was fent over, with fome of the young nobility, a reafonable fupply of money, and a fmall body of old troops, into Guienne, where he was received with great joy, and carried on the war with fpirit, while the French forces under Gafton Phœbus, count of Foix, and the conftable de Bourbon, gave him very little opposition, because their pride and jealoufy of command would never allow them to act in conjunction<sup>b</sup>. In the autumn Edward himfelf croffed the fea to Calais, with a good army; and having taken the field, rayaged the country to the gates of Hedin. John, having at length collected a fuperior army, marched directly to give him battle, and fent one of the marshals of France to offer it; but the king of England anfwered, that he would fight when he thought fit, and fo retired again to Calais. John, perceiving clearly that this war would prove too weighty for his revenue, called an affembly of the three states of the realm at Paris, before whom he laid a true ftate of his affairs, and defired their affiftance. They confented accordingly to maintain thirty thousand men fo long as the war should last; revived the gabelle on falt, which had been fuppreffed on the death of king Philip; imposed many other taxes, and fettled a A.D. 1355. committee of accompts, who were to levy, receive, and --difburfe the moncy thus granted, for the purpofes to which it ought to be applied; an inconteitable proof of the liberty which the French nation enjoyed at this time, and which was not inferior to that of any other in Europe'.

There he had the address to get the king of Navarre, and most of his creatures, into his power; where, being furprifed by the king with a fmall troop of determined perfons, the count of Harcourt, and fome of the most feditious, were beheaded upon the fpot, and the king of Navarre was fent prifoner to Chateau-Gaillard 5. It was believed that this act of feverity would have defeated all their intrigues, and have prevented this country from becoming the feat of war; but it fell out quite otherwife; for prince Philip of Navarre broke out immediately into open hostilities; demanded and received fuccours from the English, fo that all Normandy was in confusion. Amongst the most active in these troubles was Geoffrey de Harcourt, whom king Philip had pardoned, and who now took up arms again to revenge the death of his nephew, and in one of thefe expeditions he was flain: but king Edward retained fuch a fenfe of his fervices, that he took care to preferve his effate to his family b.

The prince of Wales, taking advantage of this great diverfion, marched from Bourdeaux with two thousand gens d'arms, and fix thousand archers; and, after traversing Auvergne, entered into Berry, plundered all the country round, and amaffed a very rich booty. On the news, however, that the king was advancing towards him with fifty thousand men, he resolved to retire through Touraine and Poitou into Guienne; but the king, confcious of his own fuperiority, took his meafures for furrounding him fo well, and puthed him with fuch vivacity, that at length he came up with him at Maupertuis, two leagues from Poictiers, having fo effectually fecured the paffes, that it was in a manner impoffible for him to avoid fighting, for which, in this fituation, the prince made the beft difposition possible i. The dauphin found the reft of the affembly of the flates exactly in the fame difpolition; fo that, without attending either to his or the public di ..., they began to prefcribe to him whom he fhould turn out, or whom he fliould take in, fo that he was glad to let them feparate, under pretence of giving him time to make a vifit to his uncle the emperor. Soon after the king of Navarre made his efcape, and was in a little time brought in triumph to Paris, where by his eloquence, of which he made a very free ufe upon all occafions, he governed the populace at his pleafure, fo that the dauphin knew not what to do, or whom to truft. He was obliged to call another affembly of the flates; but inftead of governing them, they appointed a council to govern him. He now followed the example of the king of Navarre, began to harrangue the citizens at their common hall, and made, in a flort time, a great progrefs in popularity". An accident spoiled all : a common fellow murdered the treasurer of France, and then retired into a privileged place; upon which the dauphin fent the two marshals of Dauphiné and Champagne to take the criminal out of fanctuary, and hang him without farther ceremony. The bilhop of Paris immediately exclaimed that the privileges of the church were invaded; and the provoft of the merchants, Marcel, by whofe infligation the murder was done, having raifed a general infurrection, went to the lodgings of the dauphin, butchered both the marshals be-

The dauphin conceived hopes from this refufal; taking advantage of the king of Navarre's being in Normandy, he went to the parliament, and demanded from them the title and authority of regent, which was granted; then he gave the great feal to his chancellor of Normandy, and the fword of conftable to Moreau de Fiennes : afterwards he affembled the flates of Ficardy and Champagne, where he was received, obeyed, and alfifted, to the utmoft extent of his wifnes and their power <sup>9</sup>.

The nobility, as we before obferved, were fo far from entertaining any just fentiments of the danger and diffrefs to which the nation was exposed, that, on the contrary, they pufhed their pride, luxury, and ill-timed magnificence farther than can be well imagined, pillaging the poor peafants who inhabited their lands, and using it as a common phrafe of reproach, Jacque bon homme, that is, good man James, or, as we would fay, the poor Jack, Shall pay for all'. help venting their complaints to each other, deploring the hapless flate they were in, and the want of any reasonable hopes of feeing things mend. It happened that fome peafants about Beauvois difcourfing upon this fubject, and inveighing against the inhumanity of their lords, their want of regard to the honour of France, and their contemptuous behaviour to the king under his misfortunes, wrought themfelves at laft to fuch a height of fury, that they refolved to extirpate the whole nobility. Laying hold of pitch-forks, ftaffs, reap-hooks, and fuch rough inftruments of mifchief as came in their way, they began to carry their defperate defign into execution, deftroying, without mercy, the families of fuch as they could furprife, and plundered their houfes. This humour diffufed itfelf into feveral provinces; and this mutinous rabble, from the circumstances before mentioned, were styled the Jacquerie<sup>3</sup>. The nobility, who in those days made the use of arms their fole profession, assembled for their own defence, and, in a little time, took a fevere revenge on thefe undifciplined multitudes. The duke of Orleans charged them in the neighbourhood of Paris, and cut off ten thoufand; the king of Navarre fell upon another body, and put twelve thousand to the fword, with their principal leader William Caillet 1. The regent alfo laid hold of this occasion to raife an army of thirty thousand men; but, acting with more moderation, he engaged many of them to lay down their arms, and at length appeared with his forces before Paris. The citizens, fenfible of the ill ufage he had received, endeavoured to pacify him; but the provoft Marcel, forefeeing that he fhould be the victim in cafe of an accommodation, excited a fresh fedition, and called in the king of Navarre with a body of English and Norman troops; but as thefe did not observe the ftrictest A.D.1368. difcipline, new diffurbances happened, and they were expelled ". The provoft and his faction confpired to deliver the city entirely into his hands; but their defign being difcovered at the very point of execution, the provoft, with the ringleaders of his party, were deftroyed, and the gates being opened to the regent, the public tranquility was gradually reftored, notwithstanding the efforts made by the king of Navarre to prevent it, which at length rofe fo high, that he fent a public defiance to the regent, and broke out into open war w.

King of Navarre Javes France and the regent, by making a peace on reasonable terms.

As there were at this time great bodies of English troops in different parts of France, under the command of officers who acknowleged no fuperior, and acted on no principle but that of getting the most they could, it was by the affiltance of thefe that the king of Navarre hoped to carry his point; and what that was will not be difficult to learn, when we know that he made a folemn declaration, that, for the future, he would never acknowlege any right in the houfe of Valois to the crown of France". By the help of these independent bodies of English, who were, beyond comparison, better foldiers than the dauphin's new raifed troops, he fo ftraitened the city of Paris, in which he had ftill a great number of friends, that, at length, it became more than probable he would have prevailed, and have had the city delivered to him by capitulation at leaft, if not without. But of a fudden, and contrary to all expectation, and without any visible motive, he demanded an interview with the regent, and concluded a peace with him on moderate and reafonable terms y. The writers of those days attribute this moderation to infoiration from heaven; on the other hand, his brother Philip faid he was bewitched; later writers afcribe it to the inconflancy of his temper; but all agree, that this conduct of his faved France, and the fubfequent part of this hiftory will put it beyond doubt. The truth of this perplexed bufinefs feems to have been, that, in his harangue to the people of Paris, he had fuffered words to efcape him to this effect, " That, if right took place, he had a better title to the crown of France than either he who wore it or he who pretended to it;" which expression being reported in England, he quickly found that he was to expect no farther affiftance from thence; for, as to what was given him by the truce before mentioned, Edward difavowed it. The king of Navarre, therefore, began to confider what effects would follow upon the taking of Paris; and perceiving clearly that it would ferve only to enrich the free-booters, his allies, in the first inftance, and facilitate Edward's defign of fetting that crown on his own head, with whom he fhould be much lefs able to deal with than with king John and the dauphin, he very wifely altered his plan, and made an equitable peace, to which his brother Philip refused to accede, but continued to carry on the war in Normandy in conjunction with the English 2.

All this time king John remained in England, under Ulare of circumilances none of the most pleasing. On his arrival king John he made a public entry into the city of London, but it in Engwas fuch an entry as could give him no difquiet. He land; conrode on a white courfer, which, in those days, when made by punctilios were much observed, was a mark of fovereignty, him; Edand the prince of Wales, on a little black horfe, rode by ward mhis fide . He had lodgings affigned him in the Savoy, vades France. where he was treated with all the refpect due to his high rank, and with all the effeem which his great perfonal merit deferved. The king, the queen, the princes of the royal blood, paid him vifits, and endeavoured to comfort him: he had liberty to go where he pleafed, to take the diversion of hunting; was feasted and careffe I by the nobility, and adored by the people; for, with all the heat of his temper, he had an affability and a condefcention that made fubjects of all who approached him; and he had his favourite fon Philip, to whom Edward is faid to have given the furname of Hardy, for reprin anding a gentleman who ferved that monarch with wine before his tather. But, notwithftanding all this comfort, he had his forrows<sup>b</sup>. His subjects had shewn but little concern for him from the time he was taken : on the contrary, in the first affembly of the states, all they laboured was to reduce his authority. His queen, though a princefs of incomparable merit, being little regarded at Paris, withdrew into her fon's dominions, and died in Burgundy. His ranfom, or his liberty, fcarce occupied the attention of any of the affemblies; and, in a word, he feemed to be fo thoroughly abandoned, that he took a refolution of concluding a treaty with Edward, upon the best terms he could obtain : but when he had concluded it, and, in conjunction with Edward, fent it over to the regent in order to have it ratified, the flates thought them fo hard and fo difhonourable, that they refused their approbation, a refufal which equally difplcafed both kings, and gave Edward an opportunity of returning to France as foon as the truce expired . This truce was made for two years; and fome of the French authors feem to think, that if the cardinals who made it had not prevailed, France must have been inevitably conquered. Yet, if we confider facts, they will fearce leave us any room to doubt that this truce was more fatal to France than if the war had con-

Edward was aware of all this, and, under colour of punishing fuch as were in the ftyle of his court rebels alike to both kings, he raifed an army, and equipped a fleet, which plainly enough expreffed his real intention to become the mafter, as well as to affume the title of France; and accounts fufficiently for the alteration of his conduct towards king John, whom, with his fon Philip, he committed to close prifon. His fleet, transports included, confisted of eleven hundred fail, and his army, when landed at Calais, and joined by the troops which were before in France, amounted to one hundred thousand men. He began his campaign in the month of November, and, though the feafon was rude, he continued in the field, on a fuppolition that he should quickly receive submissions from most of the provinces in France °.

The regent was very fenfible, that he had not either money or men at his disposal sufficient to give any direct opposition to fuch a force : he took, therefore, the only method that was left, and with great prudence diffributed what troops he had through the principal cities and and returns towns in the kingdom, under officers of diftinguished courage and indifputable integrity. This conduct had its effect; for, though Edward marched up and down where he thought fit, and plundered and laid wafte the country at his pleafure, infomuch that he drew from the duchy of Burgundy, by way of contribution, two hundred thousand florins, exclusive of provisions, yet no place of any confequence fubmitted f. At length he invefted Rheims, with an intention, as the French hiftorians fay, to have caufed himfelf to be crowned there, as foon as he became mafter of the city. But the archbifhop, who had a confiderable force in the place, defended it for about fix weeks; and then the king decamping, marched towards the Loire, carrying with him his dogs and his hawks, that he might hunt and take his pleafure, and that the world might fee how little he apprchended from

At length he changed his course and took the route of Paris, where the regent was with what forces he could collect, to whom he fent a defiance by a herald; but that prince was wifer than to change his meafures, or to rifk another day like those of Creffy or of Poictiers . The pope's legates all this time folicited Edward to liften to an accommodation, in order to which the plenipotentiaries from the regent followed his camp; but, though the duke of Lancaster joined his intreaties to their's, he fhewed great coldness to thefe motions for peace, till, towards the close of April, being encamped in the open fields that lie round Chartres, fuch a ftorm of thunder and lightning arole as aftonished his army and himfelf, by which many of his foldiers, and above a thoufand horfes, perifhed b. Edward, looking upon this as a fignal from heaven, fent his plenipotentiaries to the village of Bretigny, about a league from Chartres, where they met the French ministers on the first of May, and concluded their conferences on the eighth. This treaty was in the names of the two princes Charles and Edward; the regent fwore to the due performance of it on the tenth, and the prince of Wales on the fixteenth of the fame month<sup>1</sup>. A truce now took place, till things could be finally adjusted. King John passed the fea to Calais in the month of July, where the regent was permitted to vifit him; but it was three months before Edward could A.D. 1362. go thither and put the laft hand to the treaty; which being fworn to by both kings, John was fet at liberty, on the 21th of October, after a captivity of more than four years. In his way to Paris he was met by the king of Navarre, who promifed to live with him for the future in the strictest friendship. On the 13th of December he made his public entry into the city of Paris, where the inhabitants in general, and the common people in particular, gave great testimonies of joy, and made him a prefent of filver plate that weighed about a thoufand marks k.

To thefe calamities were added two others, ftill more fenfibly felt; the first was a plague, that fwept away upwards of thirty thoufand perfons within the compais of a year at Paris; the other, an inundation of difbanded foldiers, who had formerly ferved in the English army, and now, under the command of officers of their own chufing, made a lawlefs and cruel war, to fill their own pockets. These styled themfelves the Tard-venus, or the Late-comers, fignifying that they had only the gleanings of the late harvest that had been made in France ". The king, after they had been difowned and declared robbers by the English, ordered the constable James de Bourbon to march against them, accompanied by many of the nobility, and an army of twelve thousand men. He had, however, the misfortune to be totally defeated, he himfelf and his fon were mortally wounded, the greatest part of the nobility flain, and the reft made prifoners, by which event the whole kingdom was laid open to thefe infatiate plunderers ". They then feparated into two bodies; one of which, under the command of Seguin de Badofol, wafted the countries of Lyonnois, Beaujolois, and Nivernois; the other, under various commanders, took the route of Avignon, in order to ranfom the pope and his cardinals. In their paffage they made themfelves mafters of Pont St. Efprit, where they met with an immenfe booty, and where they elected a general, who flyled himfelf the Friend of God, and the Enemy of all Mankind °. At fome diftance of time, the king, with much difficulty, and at the expence of a vaft fum of money, prevailed upon Badofol to retire into his own country of Gafcony; and the marquis of Montferrat, whom the pope had fent for to his affiftance, engaged him to follow him into Italy P. John de Bologne, the uncle of the deceafed duke, by the mother's fide, had the counties of Bologne and Auvergne. and the count of Flanders, obtained the counties of Bargundy and Artois r.

King John finding himfelf much lefs at his eafe than he King John expected, his court far from being fo magnificent as for- beflows the nierly, and the power of the dauphin, fince he became re- duchy of Burgundy gent, fuch as in fome meafure reftrained his own, he re- on his for folved to divert himfelf for fome thort time, by making a Philip, and tour to Avignon to confer with pope Innocent VI. to whom declares he had great obligations; for that pontiff had interpoled, him first upon all occasions, and fometimes with more warmth than prince of was decent, on his behalf 5. In this journey he took the opportunity of visiting his new acquisition the duchy of Burgundy. On his arrival, the inhabitants of all ranks. but more efpecially the nobility and the inhabitants of great towns, applied to him, with great duty and humility, reprefenting that they had been fo long ufed to be governed by a prince of their own of the blood royal of France, that it was impolfible for them to be happy under any other form of rule, and therefore intreated him that he would for far comply with their culloms, as to beflow upon them one of his fons for their duke. It feems not improbable that the king and his petitioners underftood each other's mind; at least it is certain that they came very foon to an agreement, fince, notwithstanding the late reunion of the duchy to the crown, John, by his letters patent, containing very high commendations of his favourite fon Philip, granted to him and his heirs, procreated in lawful wedlock, that duchy, in as full a manner as it had been held by its former dukes; and, as a mark of fpecial favour, declared this new duke the first peer of France t. This deed was afterwards confirmed, out of respect to his father, and with little regard to the rules of true policy, by his brother Charles the Wife. This fortunate young prince Philip, by the marriage of his predeceffor's widow, (who was alfo

According to fome writers, king John arrived at Avignon in the life-time of pope Innocent VI. according to others, immediately after his deceafe. He was fucceeded in the pontifical throne by William Grimoaldi, abbot of St. Victor at Marfeilles, who was not fo much as a cardi-V. takes the nal. At the time of his election he was minifler at the court of Naples; but being recalled to Avignon, he accepted the papal dignity, and assumed the name of Urban V w. The king of Cyprus coming to entreat his fayour and protection against the infidels, to whose infults his dominions were continually exposed, he entered fo warmly into his interefts, and recommended them with fuch vehemence in his fermons and difcourfes, that king Tohn took the crofs on Good-Friday, notwithstanding all the opposition that such of the nobility as were about him made to a project of this kind, when his dominions were in fo unfettled a condition, exhaufted of men and money, and fo many difputes raifed as to the true meaning of feveral articles in the treaty of Bretigny, that a war with England was more likely to enfue than that peace to fubfift *. But king John attributed the misfortunes of his father, and feveral of his predeceffors, to their taking the crofs, and not fulfilling their vows. He had imagined a poffibility, by the help of this expedition, to carry the greatest part of the companions, the best troops and the worft men in Europe, into places where their valour might be employed, and their thirst of riches gratified, without prejudice to Chriftendom. Befides, his lofty temper was gratified by the title of generalifimo of the Chriftian ar-A.D.1363. mies; fo that he entered with great heat into this new defign, for which he is grievoully cenfured by the French historians, both ancient and modern, as a prince who facrificed to his own humour the welfare of his fubjects y.

At his return into France, king John met with fresh cir- His fon the cumftances of difficulty and difpleafure. The hoftages duke of Anthat had been fent into England for the performance of the jou, elcates treaty, and for the payment of the king's ranfom, grew *from Eng-*very uncafy at the uncertain and diftant profpect of their where he return home. King Edward taking advantage of this im- was an patience, framed, with their concurrence, a kind of new koflage, convention, in which the reciprocal renunciation of claims and refufes was contained; and farther, a release from king John, from all pretentions of fatisfaction for the fpoil and damage committed by the Companions and Late-comers, in breach of the truce z. This convention did not appear very unreafonable to king John; but the dauphin and the parliament, who confidered those pretensions as the only means they had to prevent the rigorous execution of that harfh treaty, difapproved the convention entirely; upon which the hoftages, who had been carried over to Calais, that they might contribute, by their folicitations, to the ratification of this peace, were more closely confined. Lewis, count of Anjou, the king's fon, bore this reftraint fo impatiently, that he made his efcape, to the great grief of the king, who would not fuffer him to remain in his prefence, but ordered him to return to England again, purfuant to his famous maxim, that if truth and good faith were banished from the world, they ought at least to refide in the mouths and hearts of princes a. As prince Lewis did not think fit to obey him, king John took a fudden refolution of returning himfelf to London; from which he was not to be diffuaded, as holding himfelf obliged thereto by the treaty. and hoping alfo to bring things to a better conclution with king Edward in perfon, than it was possible for him to do by the interpolition of minifters b.

He passed the fea in the Christmas holidays, and landed King John at Dover the 4th of January, where he was received with goes over great honour. rin, occafioned by this difappointment, or fome natural malady, was the caufe, fo it was, that he fell into a wafting and languishing condition, of which he died on the 8th of April; having the fatisfaction, however, of being attended in his laft moments by his brother the duke of Orleans, his fon the duke of Berry, and his coufins Lewis, A.D.1364. duke of Bourbon, and John d'Artois, count d'Eu 4. He deceased in the fifty-fixth year of his age, and in the fourteenth of his reign, more regretted and beloved by the English than by his own fubjects; his funeral was folemnized with great pomp, at which Edward affifted in perfor, in deep mourning, and his corpfe was afterwards fent over to France, attended by the count d'Eu. This monarch had the furname of the Good; for which fome hiftorians find themfelves at a lofs to account, becaufe they behold him in the light of an impetuous, obflinate, and over-bearing prince, who liftened only to his own notions, which were commonly dictated by his paffions °: but, as they confefs, he was unfeignedly pious, candid, honeft, and fincere, as brave as any man of his time, generous, magnificent, and affable. Posterity may, perhaps, be inclined to think that fome furnames might be mentioned, even amongst the French kings, that were not at all better founded; be this as it may, he left his dominions in a deplorable condition, and his fon and fucceffor under great difficulties. But negociation was not his talent, and the hopes he had of perfuading, in conjunction with the king of Cyprus, Edward III. to close his victorious reign by a croifade, deceived him; for that king anfwered civilly, but coldly, that he was now arrived at too great an age to think of feeking foreign adventures, though he was fome years younger than king John, and of a much more robuft conflitution (C).

He found the kingdom in a diffracted and diffreffed condition; he bent his utmost endeavours to recover and reftore it. and he did this flowly and filently, by making choice of wife ministers and able generals, referving to himfelf the great fecrets of ftate, and iffuing his orders with the fame coolnefs and punctuality, when his affairs were in the worft and in the beft condition. The king of Navarre was in arms in Normandy, at the time of his father's deceafe, and had a good army there, well paid, under the command of John de Grailli, captal de Buch. Charles had not either men or money to oppose him ; but he fent Bertrand du Gueflin, an officer of great reputation, to command in Normandy, and he, partly by his arts, but chiefly by his fame, raifed a confiderable body of forces, with whom he defeated and made prifoner the captal, at the battle of Cocherel. It was no great affair; but we find it as particularly defcribed by the writers of those times as any action that had happened in France, out of regard, as they fay, to the generals, who became afterwards the most diftinguished of their time; but, in reality, becaufe it was the first dispute of any note in which the French troops had been victorious, fince the battle of Creffy 5. him at that battle. He declared du Gueflin marshal of Normandy, and count of Longueville, which country had reverted to the crown by the death of prince Philip, brother to the king of Navarre. This method of punishing and rewarding with eclat the king commonly followed, with good effect . He confirmed his father's grants to his youngest brother; augmented the appenages of his other brothers; and rendered great kindneffes to all the princes of his blood, contrary to the maxims of his grandfather Philip de Valois, who did all he could to keep them low. Yet, to fill his coffers, in fome degree he had recourse to an act of refumption, making it his choice rather to difoblige the great than to oppress the little I. In Bretagne, the war being renewed, the young count de Montfort defeated Charles le Blois in the battle of Auray, in which he fell. The king, who managed every occasion with great address, laid hold of this; admitted the count to do homage as duke of Bretagne; and fecured to the widow of Charles le Blois the title of duchefs of Bretagne. for her life, a penfion of forty thousand livres, and the county of Penthievre for her children, with the remainder of the duchy to them, in cafe of the failure of helrs in the reigning family k.

The new duke of Bretagne, who was much of the fame age with the French king, came to Paris to pay his homage, in virtue of the treaty; and, at this interview, both princes fhewed great marks of effeem and condefcention for each other. Bertrand du Gueslin, who had been taken prisoner in the war of Bretagne, was fet at liberty; and the duke, perceiving how great his credit was at the court of France, confirmed to him the grants that had been made by his predeceffor; at the fame time the king took Oliver Cliffon, and other Bretons into his fervice, without giving the duke any offence. But he could not draw that prince into a marriage to his fatisfaction, upon the lofs of his wife, who was a daughter to king Edward, but on the contrary he efpoufed the daughter of the princefs of Wales, by her first hufband, fo that he still maintained his connection with Eng-Irnd 1. The captal de Buch, though a prifoner, was extremely well received by the court of France. The captal could not refift the king's careffes, who releafed him without ranfom, and who, on his entering into his fervice, made him a prefent of the county of Nemours. But upon his going to Bourdeaux, the prince of Wales telling him, that it was impossible to ferve two masters, he returned the king his patent for the county of Nemours, and remained with his old lord m. The low ftate of his finances continued still to give the king a great deal of trouble; because the fituation of his fubjects in general was fuch, that it was not either prudent or fafe to impofe any new taxes, or even to exact, with the ufual rigour, those they had been formerly accustomed to pay ". This confideration obliged the king to have recourfe to methods not very agreeable either to his rank or to his nature. His uncle Philip duke of Orleans, who had been long prifoner in England, had a very large eftate, a confiderable part of which arofe from grants that had been made by the late king ; and thefe, in the prefent ftate of things, the king determined to refume. The process was no fooner commenced with this view, than the duke of Orleans, instead of defending himfelf, declared in full parliament, that though he thought and believed he poffeffed nothing but by a legal right, yet knowing the king's motive, he furrendered the whole into his hands, and fhould be content with whatever he thought fit to reftore °. This ftep defeated Charles's fcheme, who only accepted of his uncle's renunciation to confirm his titles in the ftrongeft manner. The king, however, had recourfe to fumptuary laws for reprefling luxury, which was ftill at a great height; and for encouraging industry, as the fole means of relieving his people ; and enforcing thefe, not fo much by penalties as his own example, they had their effect P.

The composition of affairs in Bretagne, and the peace The Grand concluded with the king of Navarre, feemed to leave Companies France much at eafe, and to allow king Charles leifure to France, put in practice the fchemes he had formed for reftoring and reduce prosperity to his subjects; and yet from these treatics fol- the king lowed an evil, that brought the nation into greater diffrefs and his

than ever it had felt before. While the war lafted, Brctagne, which did not belong to the crown of France, and Normandy, felt the weight of it, while other provinces had time to breathe. But now these mischiefs were carried into every part of the kingdom, by the troops that were difbanded on all fides on the conclusion of those treaties 9. This evil flowed chiefly from the manner in which armies were formed in those days, and was the most terrible fcourge to which any country could be exposed: for thefe foldiers did not ftraggle about the country, either fingly or in fmall bands, robbing and pilfering at their pleafure, but were formed into large corps, under the command of fome knight or officer of diffinction, who, having raifed himfelf in fervice, but having no eftate, chofe this method of fupporting himfelf, and those who adhered to him ". When these corps appeared fingle and feparate they were flyled the Malandrins; but after fix or feven of these knights entered into a confederacy, though their corps were at a confiderable diffance, to march to each other's relief, in cafe of any attack, they affumed the name of the Grand Companies, and became very formidable in point of ftrength, as well as dreadfully oppreffive '. One of thefe knights, who ftyled himfelf the Archprieft, had fuch a ftrength, that, after fpoiling Champagne and Burgundy, he made an irruption into the territories of the empire, and would have done more mifchief, if fome of his own foldiers had not murdered him in a fit of refentment. The king faw, with the greatest anguish of mind, his subjects oppressed and exhausted, and himfelf treated with contempt, without any power of redrefs. With fmall forces, or even larger bodies of the troops haftily raifed, there was nothing to be done; and to fet on foot an army required money, which he had not 1. In the mean time this evil was intolerable. He complained of it to king Edward, a great part of the Companions being his fubjects. It touched the king of England in honour as well as in intereft; he therefore iffued. a proclamation, requiring them to lay down their arms, and no longer to moleft the people of France. Some few obeyed, and but a few; the reft fent him for anfwer, that they held nothing from him, and that they would not abandon the places they had feized, or difband their corps, for him or any prince living. This infolence fo provoked Edward, that he refolved to pafs the feas with a numerous army, if king Charles had not declined his affiltance, having, as he faid, found out a method of relieving himfelf : on which Edward fwore, he might truft to that method, for help he fhould have none from him, if they drove him out of his dominions". But Charles was by no means willing to have Edward again in France at the head of a potent army, for reafons that will appear.

The man who delivered the king and his fubjects, when Bertrand in this terrible dilemma, was Bertrand du Guellin, who un- du Guellin dertook to perfuade the Companions to quit France of their engages own accord; and having opened his project to the king, them in an expedition he approved, and offered him all the affiftance in his into Spain power ". Thus encouraged, he went to a meeting of their with the chiefs, who were all his old acquaintance, and molt of them king's conhis intimate friends; after being, for fome days, a com- fent. panion of their mirth, he observed to their chiefs, that it was a bale and diffionourable kind of life they led, and that the fhame of it, inflead of being alleviated, was heightened by their birth and rank. They pleaded neceffity; to which Gueflin replied, that the Moors were still in poffeffion of Granada, and other rich provinces in Spain; that it would be more safe, more advantageous, as well as more honourable, to turn their arms against these infidels; that he would undertake to procure them the means, in every refpect, of embarking in fuch an enterprize, and would accompany them in the expedition *. This offer they readily accepted; upon which thirty-five of their chiefs went to Paris, where they were kindly received, and magnificently feafted, by the king, at the Temple, and, befides rich prefents, had two hundred thousand franks given them for the current expences of their expedition. Their rendezvous was fixed for Chalons on the Soane, where du Gueflin joined them, with three hundred of the most gallant gentlemen in Bretagne. Charles fent a marfhal of France to fee them out of his dominions, and to conduct them with as little prejudice to his fubjects as poffible. The route that they took was to Avignon. The pope, alarmed at their approach, fent a cardinal to meet them; who demanding what they were, and why they came; du Gueflin told him; they were thirty thoufand croffes, marching against the infidels, and that they were defirous to have the pope's abfolution, and a couple of hundred thousand florins by way of alms y. At the time the prince of Wales returned from his Spanifh expedition, he found a melancholy alteration in his affairs. Peftilence and a very hot climate had confumed the greateft part of his army. Don Pedro, in deceiving him, left an immense debt upon his fhoulders, instead of the mighty reward he had promifed him; and, which was worst of all, a latent diseafe, which degenerated into a dropfy, brought upon him great infirmity of body, which rendered him the lefs able to apply proper remedies for ftopping the declining flate of his affairs. The war had drawn him into prodigious expence, and into a variety of engagements, which he knew not how to difcharge. Six thousand of the Companions, all that remained of those dreadful troops, were quartered in his territories, till their wages could be paid. Befides, he could not bear the thoughts of retrenching his court, which had been hitherto at leaft as magnificent as those of Paris or London i. This emergency obliged him to impose a florin upon every hearth within his territories; which, though fubmitted to in most places, yet in Guienne it was opposed with the greatest vehemence, the count of Armagnac and other great lords looking upon it as a violation of their privileges; which, at all events, they determined to maintain k. Charles confidering, that two-thirds of his father's ranfom was paid, most of the hostages redeemed, his people in a great measure recovering, his neighbours well-affected to him, and the concerns of Edward fuch as left him lefs able to maintain a war than at any time fince the peace of Bretigny, began to liften to the complaints of the Gafcons. He had his emiffaries in the county of Ponthieu, and in other parts of the English conquests, where they found a great spirit of difcontent, which they took all pollible pains to cherish and increase 1. At length, he laid the treaty of Bretigny, and all the fubfequent proceedings, before his court of peers, and demanded their advice; in confequence of which he fummoned the prince of Wales to appear, and answer the complaints made against him by his barons. To this citation he answered with difdain, that he would appear, but it fhould be with a retinue of fixty thoufand men; and he likewife caufed thofe, who had fummoned him, to be arrefted. Hoftilities did not immediately follow; on the contrary, a negociation enfued with the court of London. King Edward infifted, that the crown of France had no fovereignty over the provinces he poffefied, and that the appeal of the Galcon lords was an act of rebellion : on the other hand, Charles afferted, that Edward, having never renounced his preten- A D.1368. fions to the crown of France, the duchies of Normandy, Anjou, and Maine, he ftill retained the fovercignty over Guienne and the reft of the provinces m.

In this af- begin a fembly he managed all things with fuch addrefs, that the clergy declared the king, in all his proceedings, had acted in a manner fuitable to the principles of religion and couity". The nobility promifed to affift him with their lives and fortunes, and the third eftate applauded his majefty's justice and moderation, with a promife to support fo good a caufe to the utmost of their power. As the king wanted no more at this time, they were difnified without fo much as the mention of new taxes; but, in confequence of these declarations, Charles, without ceremony, declared war against Edward; who refumed the title of king of France, and prepared to punifh what he flyled temerity and breach of faith. The war, on the fide of Guienne, was rather favourable to Charles; for the Companious revolted, in a great measure, to him; a defection which furprifed the prince of Wales, who had also the misfortune to lofe the lord Chandos, one of the wifeft men, and one of the ableft officers, in his fervice, who was killed in a fkirmish °. The county of Ponthieu, in Picardy, revolted; but the fleet, which the king had affembled at Harfleur, with an intent to invade England, was rendered ufelefs by the arrival of John of Gaunt duke of Lancaster, and a great body of English troops; for this obliged the king to oppofe to him his brother Philip of Burgundy, with the forces that flouid have embarked for a naval expedition. There was, however, very little done on this fide by either party; for Charles had expressly prohibited his brother from fighting, and the attempt made by the duke of Lancaster to burn the fleet was alfo very luckily A.D.1360, prevented . In September, the flates met again, and, upon a detail of what had happened fince they had been held laft, they unanimously agreed to impose the fame taxes that had been levied for the release of king John, with the addition of hearth-money ; which was effeemed a more equal, though a heavier tax than a capitation. A method of proceeding which aftonished all Europe, who fuppofed France to be quite exhaufted 9.

In confequence of thefe great aids, the king augmented his forces; and, upon the refignation of the good old constable Fiennes, determined to recall Bertrand du Gueslin on with ad- out of Spain; who not only very readily obeyed, though wantage on amply provided for by the king of Caffile, but negociated and figned a treaty with that monarch, by which he agreed to affift king Charles with a force by fea. On the arrival of this celebrated officer in France, he was first employed in Guienne, where the king's brother made no fcruple of ferving under him, though he had no title, or fo much as a regular command . He recovered many places in a fhort fpace of time, and would have without doubt, made a greater progrefs, if the king had not fent for him to oppofe Sir Robert Knolles; who, with a body of English forces, after having ravaged Champagne, advanced into the neighbourhood of Paris, and burnt fome finall towns in the fight of that city, where the king was with a confiderable number of troops; but he would not be drawn out, or run any hazard : on the arrival of Bertrand, he had the fword of conftable delivered to him, and was directed, with a small fum of money to raife troops'. The king might have given him greater forces, but he was afraid he would hazard a battle. The conftable, with the few troops he had, ftopped the progress of Knolles, and recovered most of the places he had taken: the king commended his prudence highly, though now and then he ventured on a bold stroke. His fuccels revived the spirit of the French nation, and made them endure with patience the heavy taxes which the laft affembly of the ftates had impofed, the rather becaufe the king took the precaution of engaging the clergy every where to preach up the jultice of his caufe, and to urge the neceflity of continuing a war, that was of equal importance to the crown and to the people '. A.D.1370. About this time died pope Urban V. who had done that monarch effential fervices, and who was fucceeded by Gregory XI. whom he likewife gained to his fide. To balance thefe advantages, king Edward drew over the duke of Guelderland to his party, and would have made a greater progrefs amongst the princes of the empire, if Charles had not prevented him, by augmenting their penfions, and by inviting leveral of them to his court, where they were treated with all possible attention and respect. He could not, however, prevent the king of Navarie from paffing privately into England, where he concluded the treaty of Clarendon with king Edward, the fubitance of which was not known in France till fome years after; but Charles, however, took his meafures fo prudently, that it had no effect ".

The conftable returned in the winter to Paris, and con- Methods certed with the king the operations of the next campaign; taken to in regard to which the greatest difficulty was to find the his allifunds requifite for the payment of the troops. By the anes. counfel of du Gueflin, the king gave a gentle squeeze to the officers of his treafury, who, it was fuspected, had fole, but who, it was certain, could fpare : he borrowed likewife large fums of the lawyers : and the clergy, who having fo often declared to the people the juffice of the war, could not refule to fupport it. But these were temporaty expedients, which the king knew might, in their confequences, do him more hurt then good; and therefore he appointed commiffaries for the payment of his troops, who accounted to the conftable, and the conftable to the king; and out of the money he faved, he punctually paid his debts w. He had this year five corps in the field; none of any great force, but fufficient to take towns, more efpecially by intelligence, and to harrafs the English army, instead of coming to a battle; for he still remembered Creffy and Poitiers ; though he kept a numerous body of troops about his perfon, that he might pufh any extraordinary fuccefs, or repair any unforeseen misfortune, without delay*. war with fuccefs, and took all his meafures with fo much precaution, confented, upon hoftages given, to confer with the king, concluded a treaty with him, and left his children in his hands, notwithstanding his late treaty with England. For, knowing that neither of these monarchs wifhed him well, he held it beft, either by force or by fraud, to provide for himfelf. About this time Charles of France concluded a treaty with Robert king of Scots, and established the Scots gens d'arms at a hundred men : but it was St. Lewis who first formed this corps, entrusting his perfon to twenty-four of that nation y. The cardinal bifhop of Beauvais, perceiving how incompatible it was to be the counfellor of the king and the pope at the fame time, laid down his office of chancellor, in which, however, he was fucceeded by his brother; for it was not A.D. 1371. the king's cuftom to difgrace his minifters<sup>2</sup>. In the mean time the prince of Wales, vexed at the fuccefs of the French, refolved to recover Limoges, which he fufpected had been delivered to them by treachery; and, having reduced it, he caufed a great part of the inhabitants to be put to the fword. This was his laft exploit ; for, perceiving the people chagrined, being himfelf afflicted for the lofs of his fon Edward, and, in a manner, worn out by his difease, he returned into England. He left the government of Aquitaine to his brother John duke of Lancafter, having first taken an oath of fidelity from the barons, who troubled themfelves little about it after his departure; for the imposition, feuage, 'and other duties, had alienated their affections, which he formerly commanded ª.

Don Henry of Cafile fends a fleet to the affifance of France, which does great fervice. By the treaty which the conftable had concluded with Henry king of Cattile, that prince was bound to allift the French monarch with a fleet. The duke of Lancafter, having efpoufed the daughter of Don Peter the Cruel, affumed thereupon the title of king of Caffile and Leon; foon after which he returned to England with his brother, who had married her younger fifter, leaving the command in Aquitaine to the famous captal de Buch, with the title of conftable. Don Henry, who knew the connections which the duke of Lancafter had with the king of Navarre, and fufpecting his intentions to make a new irruption into Spain, in cafe the war with France had a favourable iffue, fent a fleet of forty fail of large thips and thirteen frigates, with inflructions to act as the king of France should direct b. Charles, having early intelligence of a great fuccour, under the command of the earl of Pembroke, that was to be feut to Rochelie, gave timely notice of it to the Caffilian admiral; who attacked that fleet on the eve of St. John, within fight of the port; and, being much fuperior in ftrength, defeated, and almost destroyed it entirely, made the earl of Pembroke, with many other perfons of diffinction, prifoners, and, amongst other large vessels, funk that which had the treafure on board for the pay of the troops; fo that it may be very truly affirmed Don Henry repaid, by this naval fuccour fo opportunely given, whatever fupport or affiftance he had received from the French crown . The conftable du Gueflin took advantage of the conficrnation this occalioned to make an irruption into Poitou, where he took feveral places of great firength, and afterwards joined the duke of Berry in the Limolin. It is, however, uncertain what the fate of the war would have been, if the captal de Buch had continued to command; but he, being furprifed and taken prifoner in a skirmish, was fent to Paris, where he was confined in the Temple; and, though immenfe fums were offered for his liberty, he ended his davs there, after five years confinement d.

Immediately after this accident, Poitiers opened her The congates to the conftable; at which event the king was fo fable du agreeably furprifed, that he ennobled the mayor, the Guellin theriffs, their descendents and fucceffors; St. John de conquers Angeli, Taillebourg, Augoulefme, Xaintes, and feveral great part other places, followed the example of Poitiers. The city lift perof Rochelle would willingly have followed their example, feffions. but there was an English garrifon in the caffle. The French mayor was too hard for the English governor, whom he invited to dinner, and produced to him an old letter, under king Edward's feal, knowing that the governor could not read; who, after he looked upon it a little time, returned it. "You fee," faid the mayor, " that the king commands we should muster both our garritons together, that the people may be better acquainted with, and have greater confidence in, each other, and I shall leave the time and manner to you." The governor drawing out his garrifon the next day, the mayor furprifed the caftle; but, before he would render the place to the constable, he infifted upon having the king's confent to raze that fortrefs, and a charter for the town as ample as that of Paris; both which were obtained, and the mayor actually demolifhed the caftle before he delivered the keys. The progrefs of the conftable's arms received fome check from the gallant defence of Fontenai le Comte, in which the lady of Sir John Harpedon commanded; who, though young and handfome, exposed her perfon as much as any private man during the fiege, and even when the place came to be ftormed, nor once offered to capitulate, till on the point of being taken; when the constable, who was a gallant man, gave her leave to prefcribe her own terms. The remains of the English officers and troops threw themfelves into Thouars, a very ftrong place, which they meant to defend to the laft extremity; but the conftable offering to allow them till the feast of St. Michael for the fuccours they expected, they confented to furrender, if not relieved by king Edward or the prince of Wales f. Edward affembled and embarked an army, commanded by himfelf and his fons, which, if it had arrived in time, might yet have changed the face of affairs; but, meeting with contrary winds, they were conftrained, not without great hazard, to regain the English coaft ; fo that, at the time appointed, Thouars fubmitted ". The constable had afterwards the good fortune to defeat John d'Evreux, who came with twelve hundred men at arms to relieve the caftle of Chifai; made himfelf mafter of that place, and furprifed Niorp, which was ftronger. and of greater confequence, all in a day; fo that Poitou was entirely reduced, and the king gave that country to A.D 1372. his brother the duke of Berry h. make himfelf felt feverely. The conftable and Oliver de Cliffon were not the only Bretons provided for in his fervice; and, befides those in his pay, he had many of the nobility in penfion; fo that he ran no great hazard in fummoning the duke to attend him as his vafial, with all the forces he could raife. It was in vain that he pleaded he was allowed a neutrality by the treaty of Bretigny; it was to l'ttle purpofe he diftinguithed between his homage for the duchy, and for his county of Montfort. The conftable entered Bretagne, with an army, on one fide; Oliver Cliffon, with his forces, invaded it on the other; the nobility and the people revolted in most places: fo that, having distributed the English fuccours into Breft, and fome other towns of importance, he retired into England k. But it was not long before he returned with John duke of Lancaster, who landed at Calais with an army of fifty thousand men, with which he proposed to reftore his father's affairs, and to rival his brother's great exploits in that kingdom. He began his march towards the end of July, and paffed through Picardy and Champagne, leaving behind him every where fufficient marks of his refentment. Charles had three armies in the field; one commanded by his brother the duke of Burgundy; another by his coufin the duke of Bourbon; and a third by the conftable, which confifted chiefly of cavalry. Befides thefe the king had a corps of four thousand gens d'arms, and a numerous body of infantry, under his own command<sup>1</sup>. The two dukes coafted the English army on each fide, the conftable followed in the rear, fo that there were frequent skirmishes; but as none of them had a ftrength fulficient, and were befides reftrained by the king's orders, there was no battle. The duke of Bretagne preffed the duke of Lancaster to march into his duchy; but that prince perfifting in his refolution to proceed to Guienne, there was never after a right understanding between them ". The duke of Lancalter, however, purfued his own measure, traverfed Burgundy and Auvergne with great rapidity, and fuffered fo much in this long march through an enemy's country, that, when he arrived, in the Chriftmas holidays, in the neighbourhood of Bourdeaux, he had fearce a fifth part of his army left. In the course of this year, the king loft his two great ministers, the chancellor and his brother the cardinal de Beauvais.

He replaced the former by Peter d'Argemont, by the election of the parliament, and the latter by the bifhop of Amiens, by his own choice; but, though fortunate in these respects, yet this year was alike fatal in Italy and England, as well as France, by a fevere famine, and by a devouring pestilence that followed it. The king. however, did all he could to keep up the fpirits of his people, and obliged the clergy to do all that was in their power likewife to cherifh and relieve them; fhewing fuch a vigilance and activity, even in the minutest things that regarded the public welfare, as contributed greatly to maintain a tranquility that had never been feen before under circumstances of a like kind, and which contributed as much to the fupport of his character, and preferving the affections of his people, as the victories he had gained, and the great turn he had given to the affairs of France ". The pope, who had fent repeated admonitions, and employed different legates to reconcile the two kings, now prefied things fo warmly, and fet the epidemic difeafes reigning throughout their dominions in fo ftrong a light, that they, at length, agreed to fend their plenipotentiaries to Bruges, in order to conclude a peace, or at least a truce. At the head of these plenipotentiaries, on one fide, were the king's brothers, Lewis duke of Anjou and Philip duke of Burgundy, and at the head of the other John duke of Lancaster. All hopes of peace were loft, by the English infifting peremptorily, that Edward should 'hold Guienne in fovereignty; to which claim the French would not hearken. At length, however, a truce was concluded for a year; but without making any mention of Bretagne°. This was a great ftroke of policy between the two kings, to relieve their own territories, and give their fubjects time to breathe; but at the fame time to nourish the flame of war in a corner, that fuch as wanted either the will, or the means, of being quiet, might find employment, and prevent the reviving of the Compa-A.D. 1374. nions. In confequence of this ceffation, John duke of Bretagne returned into his own dominions, with a confiderable body of English troops; where, from the inveterate fpirit that prevailed between the two parties, much blood was fhed, the duke confidering the oppofite party as rebels, and Oliver Cliffon openly profeffing his intention to exterminate the English, though he had ferved amongst them with great vigour in the beginning of this war. The duke, however, was very near feizing him, and most of the other chiefs, whom he had reduced to the last extremity, and to whom he refused all terms, if they had not been refcued from his vengeance by renewing the truce of Bruges for another year; in which Bretagne was included P. Charles willingly feized thefe fhort intervals of peace, in order to accomplifh many things he had in his mind for the benefit of himfelf, his family, and his people. He made an edict to fix the majority of the kings of France at their entrance into their fourteenth year; whereas Philip the Hardy had fixed it at fourteen complete. Charles caufed this edict to be registered in parliament, and then declared it a fundamental and irrevocable law of the kingdom 9. The death of his uncle the duke of Orleans was a lofs to him in fome refpects; but it augmented his revenue confiderably. He was fo provident, that, from the time of the first truce, his coffers were always full, and yet there was never a prince more liberal. He was continually giving lands and eftates to the conftable, who fold them almost as fast as he received them, and fpent the money; yet he was fo far from being extravagant, that he did not fo much as affect magnificence; but he fuffered no fervice to pals unrewarded, he left no man of merit that he knew in diftrefs '. The king who was perfectly informed of this disposition, A.D 1375. took care to support a generofity that was of fuch use to his fervice. He acted in the fame manner with regard to his ministers : he had many in different departments, and, in cafes of difficulty, he took the advice of them all; reported their opinions to three or four perfons in his cabinet, and determined with them what was to be done. His maxim was, that, even in matters of state, reasoning might be public, provided the refolution was kept fecret ".

Next year died the great terror of France, Edward the He makes Black prince, for whom the king caufed a folemn fervice u/e of the to be performed; not fo much, fay the French writers, out of respect to their kindred, as through esteem for his of Wales, perfon, and for his virtues. Immediately after this ftep, he published a general amnesty; knowing that there were many of his fubjects who had hitherto adhered to the to ruin the English interests purely out of gratitude and affection to the prince of Wales, and it had a good effect '. The truce was renewed for another year; but the hopes conceived on both fides for a peace, were defeated. The truth feems to be, that Charles had never any intention to conclude it : for at this time he entered into fresh alliances with the kings of Castile and Scotland. As foon as the truce was expired, the joint fleets of France and Spaincame upon the English coasts, made feveral defcents, and attempted more; but, except burning the town of Rye, did nothing very confiderable. It was by the prifoners taken in this expedition that the French had an account of king Edward's death; which happened near a month before, but had been concealed by an embargo". This was a kind of fignal, upon which the armies of Charles attacked the English on all fides. One army, under the command of the duke of Burgundy, entered Artois; another invaded Auvergne, under the conduct of the duke of Berry; that which acted in Guienne was commanded by the duke of Anjou; and the forces in Bretagne were under the conftable: the king himfelf had a very powerful body of troops, that he might be able to repair any accident that fhould happen through the chance of war. The conftable joined the duke of Burgundy, who found it difficult to deal with Sir Thomas Felton and the fenelchal of Bourdeaux. Soon after his arrival, the conftable attacked and defeated them, making both their command-A.D. 1377. ers prifoners of war w. This victory was fo well purfued, that, at the clofe of the campaign, Bayonne and Bourdeaux, with the diffricts about them, and the fortrefs of Calais, with its dependencies, were all the places left to England on the continent; and a ftrong appearance there was that they would not long keep thefe; for, befides the weaknefs natural to a minority, there were already great divisions in the English councils.

with all this, Charles took care not to puffi his complaiance fo far as to afford the fmallest foundation for those claims of fuperiority, which fome princes have been inclined to make from being invefted with the imperial dignity. He took occasion, on the contrary, to make fome ufe of this interview, by procuring his fon the dauphin to be declared perpetual vicar in the county of Dauphine, and the ancient kingdom of Arles, which were full reputed dependent on the emperor *. About this time happened the famous procefs against the king of Navarre, on a charge of intending to procure the king to be poifoned; for which fome perfons fuffered, and that king loft his valuable posseficitions in Normandy, by which he had been fo troublefome to the French crown, and his lordfhip of Montpelier; which was all he had for the counties of Champagne and Brie, and the duchy of Burgundy; and at this very juncture he was on the point of being deprived of the reft of his dominions, by the infant of Caftile; but Edward the Third was now dead, a circumftance which abated the terror of the English armsy. But, contrary to all probability, what was intended for the ruin, produced the reftoration, of the duke; for the nobility, who had hitherto followed the French party, revolted, recalled and received their natural prince, with all poffible testimonies of loyalty and affection, and drove the French out of the province. The king, liftening to the infinuations of the cardinal of Amiens, fhewed fome coldnefs to the constable, who thereupon offered to refign his office, and to A.D. 1379. retire into Caftile; from which defign he was, with great difficulty, diverted; and even then declared, without ceremony, that he would not ferve against his country b. Another impolitic ftep of the king was, the difbanding at once all the Breton officers and foldiers in his fervice; by which means the duke was furnished with a complete army of his own fubjects, formed and difciplined at the expence of France; with which he gained fuch advantages as produced a negociation, and a fort of project for a peace. The English, while the king was thus occupied, began to reftore their affairs, and had recovered fome confiderable places in Guienne, and feveral caftles in Auvergne and the Limofin. The conflable was fent, with a confiderable body of troops, to reprefs them; and with these he laid siege to the castle of Chateauneuf de Randan, in which there was a numerous garrifon ; who, after a long fiege, entered into a capitulation, by which they promifed to furrender, in cafe they were not relieved by the 12th of July. On that very day the conftable died, and the governor of the fortrefs, notwithstanding, brought the keys, and laid them at the feet of his corpfe<sup>c</sup>. The king expressed great concern for his death, and ordered his body to be interred in the abbey of St. Denis, between the tomb of the queen his wife, and that intended for himfelf. The earl of Buckingham, uncle to Richard the Second, arrived at Calais with a ftrong body of troops, and traverfed all France, though not without fome lofs, and threw himfelf into the country of Guienne; and, before the king could well receive advice of this irruption, he was advertifed, by the ftopping of the iffue in his arm, that he had but a fmall time to live d. He fupported the approach of death with great conftancy of mind, and, in his laft moments, fhewed much piety, and a perfect refignation. (D) The fagacity of this prince was as much celebrated in his life-time as after his demife, and yet it was not more confiderable than his modefly. He did nothing without advice, which he received thankfully, and heard patiently; but, in the end, fquared his actions by his own judgment, which was always acknowleged to be right, becaufe it was always attended with fuccefs. He left an immense treasure behind him, for which he has been cenfured by fome, and commended by others; but, without queftion, his aim in collecting it was good. He was the founder of the royal library, which is now become one of the principal ornaments of France; he left therein nine hundred volumes; whereas his father king John had not above twenty. He was rather knowing than learned; but he was a lover of learning, and a great patron of learned men, and took fo much pleafure in their conversation, that some of the nobility, who were not of that number, took it amifs. His private life was perfectly regular: he rofe early; was punctual in his devotions; dined before noon; flept after dinner; took moderate exercife; was never idle, and went to bed betimes. He was very determined, with a great appearance of irrefolution, taking his meafures while he feemed to deliberate; fo that he frequently defeated oppoficions that could not otherwife have been overcome: he was more folicitous about discipline than numbers in his armies, and took care himfelf about maga. zines and provisions, which former princes thought beneath them; and had fo perfect a comprehension of whatever might happen, that he never wanted refources, either for repairing a lofs or improving an advantage. His confort Joan, the daughter of Peter duke of Bourbon, was a princefs of exquifite beauty, admirable parts, and exemplary in her conduct : for which reafon the king took her into his councils, and advifed with her about every thing he did, with a view chiefly to enable her to act as regent during the minority of 1.4 her

In fine, all things fell into confusion, the duke of Bourbon alone acting in a manner becoming his rank, and his near relation to the young king His good intentions were, in a great meafure, fruttrated by the duke of Burgundy, who, though he had promifed to take care of the young monarch's education, made his court to him by flattering his humour, and indulging him in all kind of diversions, in which lay his fole delight; and this indulgence proved, in the courfe of his life and reign, one principal caufe of his misfortunes 1.

The duke of Berry, tired of living like a private man, demanded the government of Languedoc; in which claim he was fupported by his brother the duke of Anjou, from whom it had been taken in the late reign, on account of the exorbitant oppreffions of which he had been guilty, and beftowed on the count of Foix; but when the duke of Berry came to take possession of it, the people peremptorily declared, that they would not receive him; upon which it became neceffary to reduce them by force 1. The more fubstantial inhabitants, taking their measures in the night, affembled fuch a force as difperfed thefe rioters, and reftored the public tranquility; but the duke of Anjou, who knew there was nothing to be got by profecuting beggars, made these burghers accountable for the mischiels done by those they had disperfed; and having engaged the king his nephew to act against them, in the end extorted one hundred thousand livres for their pardon; which was all that he wanted. An eager defire to gain poffeffion of the crown of Naples was what induced the duke of Anjou to act in this rapacious manner. When he had accumulated all he could, he proceeded to Avignon, to the great joy of the whole nation, and from thence into Italy, with a better army than either of the two laft kings had been able to raife ; where, without performing any thing remarkable, except wafting all his treafure to the laft fhilling, he died of chagrin. Upon his departure the duke of Burgundy had almost the fole management of the king, whom he led with an army of twenty thousand gens d'arms, and fixty thousand foot, to the affistance of his father-in-law Lewis count of Flanders, whole fubjects were in arms, on account of the enormoustaxes he levied to maintain a diffolute court, and to fquander on his miftreffes and parafites ". The chief of the commons was Philip Artevel, the fon of James the famous brewer of Ghent; and though he was forced into these troubles, yet, being once engaged, he acted with great spirit and prudence, but it may be with too much ferocity, when he ordered no quarter to be given to the French, except to the little king Charles, whom he directed, if taken, to be brought to him, that,

This action was followed by the molt outrageous acts of feverity; and the king having humbled the Flemings, as well as reflored their count, returned into his own dominions with a victorious army, disposed to obey any orders, without prefuming to diffinguifh whether it could be for the king's fervice to cut the throats of his fubjects who were in no condition to relift °.

In this, however, they loft their aim, their force was defpifed, and the infult was punished. The little king marched into his capital at the head of his forces, took possellion of it as if he had entered it by ftorm, broke fome of their gates, beat down the chains, and fhut up their fireets, compelled them to deliver up their arms, arrefted between two and three hundred of their principal townsmen, put some of them to death every day for a fortnight, and amongst them the advocate-general, who had been often a mediator between the crown and the people, who was upwards of feventy years old, and whole greatest offence confisted in having been of the party of the duke of Anjou 9. The English, under the command of the earl of Buckingham, now duke of Gloucester, landing at Calais, marched through Picardy and Artois to the affiftance of the Flemings (for the people of Ghent still held out), and, in conjunction with them, belieged Ypres. To the relief of this place the king marched with a potent army, which the allies being too weak to refift, raifed the fiege, and the English quitting the places they had taken, were at length obliged to fortify Bourbourg, where they made fo gallant a defence, that at length it was agreed to permit them to retire, with all the honours of war, to Calais . The duke of Bretagne, at whofe requeft this expedition had been undertaken, was deeply cenfured, notwithftanding which he had credit enough to negociate a truce between the two crowns for fix months; and his power of doing this by dint of influence at the court of London, made him more fufpected and more hated s.

The year following was remarkable for the death of of Burgun- Lewis, count of Flanders, which happened towards the end of January; by which the king's uncle, Philip, added to his duchy of Burgundy that county, together with those of Artois, Retel, Nevers, and feveral other lordfhips, of which he went in perfon to take poffellion t. There was a negociation at this time carried on between the dukes of Berry, Burgundy, and Bretagne on one fide, and the dukes of Lancaster and Gloucester on the other, for a peace; but it ended only in a continuance of the truce. The duke of Anjou, the first of the second French line of the monarchs of Sicily, died about this time, under circumstances which have been before mentioned : the king took his widow and his fon under his protection, procured the pope to acknowlege the young prince in quality of king of the Two Sicilies, and fent an army to eftablish him in the county of Provence, which he held by the fame title. The king being now feventcen, of a very robust and fanguine constitution, his uncles thought it time that he fhould marry. This defign being once declared, a great many princeffes were mentioned, fuch as the daughter of the duke of Lancaster, a daughter of the duke of Lorrain, and feveral others; but the dukes of Burgundy and Bourbon, reflecting on the ftrict charge the late king had given them, that his fon fhould efpoufe

The king then acquainted the affembly, that he was under great obligations to his uncles, as well for the trouble they had taken in giving him inftructions, as for the pains they had been at in governing the realm, but that for the future, he was determined to difcharge his duty himfelf, with the affiftance of fuch a council as he fhould think fit to appoint. The chancellor explained the fubject more at large, and then collected the opinions, beginning with the cardinal of Laon, who, in a fuccinct speech, approved and applauded the king's intentions, and, in fhew at leaft, his fentiment was approved by the reft; but the dukes of Berry and Burgundy were extremely difpleafed; and the cardinal, being the chief object of their malice, perifhed foon after by poifon i. As all historians agree he was the best made, the beft bred, and the belt tempered man in his dominions, it is eafy to conceive that, by this change of meafures, he became highly popular, infomuch that his fubjects beftowed on him the furname of the Well-beloved, which he certainly deferved. He was fo far from being fufpicious; that the most malevolent infinuations made no impreision on him : " I had rather (faid he) believe well of an ill man, than run the hazard of conceiving an ill opinion of one who behaves well." Being told that a courtier, to whom he had been very kind, fpoke amifs of him, he anfwered, without emotion, " It cannot be true; for how A.D. 1328. can a man fpeak evil of us, who have done him much good ?" He had a very retentive memory; and as he paffed through the ftreets, upon public occasions, not only returned the falutes of private perfons, but fpoke to them by their names, and enquired after their families. With all this affability there was nothing of artifice; and though he made many promifes, he never failed to make them good. The fame year his brother the duke of Touraine, afterwards duke of Orleans, espoufed Valentina, daughter to the duke of Milan, and his coufingerman, after a great difappointment in regard to the heirefs of Hungary, to whom he was contracted, and who, by a real or pretended force, was prevailed on to espoufe another prince 1.

The dukes of Berry and Bur gundy retaina Arong Sinfe of their being excluded the povernment.

The king, who was of a very active disposition, who delighted in feats of arms, and who was defirous of diftinguifhing himfelf in the field, had often great enterprizes in his head. Sometimes he thought of marching against Bajazet, emperor of the Turks; at other times he proposed to terminate the fchifm which had fublifted for fo many years, by putting pope Clement VII. who relided at Avignon, in poficilion of Rome: but his ministers, and more efpecially the conftable, flewed him fo clearly what dreadful confequences would follow in cafe he embarked in either of thefe enterprizes, that, being convinced, he acquiefced in their counfel : but they fent troops to the affiftance of the Genoefe, and other allies, and fhewed all poffible attention to whatever concerned, even in a diftant degree, the honour of the crown m. The dukes of Berry and Burgundy, though they kept within the bounds of their duty, were extremely mortified by their exclusion from court, which they attributed entirely to the constable. By their connivance, at least, if not encouragement, the duke of Bretagne made no great hafte in the A.D.1390. performance of his treaty, and particularly, in reftoring the lands which belonged to the count de Penthievre, fonin-law to the conftable; upon which he invaded the territory of the duke, and great diforders were committed on both fides ". The duke of Lancafter came over to negociate a peace, in which, finding much more difficulty than he expected, he contented himfelf with renewing the truce for another year. The death of the duchefs of Orleans gave the king an opportunity of beftowing on his brother that title and duchy, not much to the fatisfaction of the inhabitants, who were very unwilling to fall under the dominion of a prince of the blood °. This averfion was chiefly owing to what had happened to the people of Languedoc, under the administration of the duke of Berry, and what they were flill like to fuffer ; for that prince had obliged the baron de Chevreufe, his fuc-ceffor, to leave it, and refign the government into the king's hands, by threats of caufing him to be affaffinated P. At length, not without difficulty, the king reftored peace on the fide of Bretagne, or rather fuspended the war : for the duke remained the irreconcileable enemy of the conftable. who was no lefs hated by the dukes of Berry and Burgundy, all the male contents referring their fuppofed grievances to him, becaufe he was at the head of the council, and flood higheft in the king's favour; and becaufe that, from A D. 1391. being a private gentleman, he had raifed himfelf by his merit to fuch high honours, and by his prudence and œconomy had acquired an immenfe fortune; which his enemies not only envied, but, in cafe of a confifcation, were in hopes they might thare 9.

Amongst the lords who made a figure at court, there P. Craon was one Peter Craon, a man of parts and pleafure, but very attempts to profligate. He had been the confident of the regent duke affafinate of Anjou, and was intrufted to bring him fupplies of mo- facte aney when he was in Italy; but he betrayed his truft, and Cliffon, and lavished in his debaucheries at Venice, what should have leaves him fupported his master and his friends at Naples, who pe- for dead. rifhed for want of it r. At his return to France, he was profecuted, and paid a large fine; but being well with the rakes at court, and becoming the declared favourite of the duke of Orleans, he had more credit than ever. The knowlege he had of that prince's intrigues proved his ruin ; for, hoping to gain the effeem of the duchefs, he informed her of fome things; fhe, to bring about a reconciliation, gave him up to the duke, who would have had him affaffinated ; but the whole tale coming to the king's ears, he forbid him the court, and ordered him to retire to his own eftate'. There, diftracted with his difgrace, which he attributed entirely to the conftable, he took the cruel refolution of murdering him; and having difpatched a band of affaffins, one by one, to Paris, he followed them thither. As the conftable returned from court about midnight, with a few attendants, he attacked him with his band of ruffians, and left him for dead, after they had given him fifty wounds'. Craon making his efcape, fled into Bretagne, where the duke, out of enmity to the constable, received and protected him. In a month's time that great man recovered, to the amazement of the court, and to the great joy of the king his mafter, who caufed

The king having demanded Craon be fent him in chains by the duke of Bretagne, that prince answered, that he knew nothing of him; to which affertion the king yielding no credit, marched with all the forces he could collect into his territories, notwithstanding the pains taken by the dukes of Berry and Burgundy to appeale him, who, after being fo long kept from court, were recalled to accompany him in this expedition". The army arriving at Mans, the king was feized with a flow fever, but could not be prevailed upon to reft or take physic. On the 5th of August, having marched all day in the heat of the fun, a miferable, ragged, wild-looking fellow darted from behind a tree, and laving hold of the bridle of his horfe, cried out, " Stop ! where are you going, king ? you are betrayed;" and immediately withdrew again into the wood. The king paffing on, not a little diffurbed, it happened that one of the two pages who rode behind him, and carried his lance, overcome with heat, fell afleep, and let it fall upon the helmet which was carried by the other; the king, hearing a tinckling noife, looked behind, and feeing the page lifting the fpear, killed him immediately; then riding furioufly with his fword drawn, he ftruck on every fide, and at every body,' till having broke his fword, one of his gentlemen leaped up behind him, and held his arm *. He fell foon after, and lay as if he had been dead; fo that being taken up, and tied in a waggon, he was carried back to Mans, where he fell into a lethargy that lasted for two A.D.1392. days, and then he came a little to himfelf . This acci-- dent put an end to the war. The dukes of Berry and Burgundy feized the government, excluding the duke of Orleans, whom his brother at the time he became frantic, had like to have killed. At their return to Paris they fent the king's principal ministers to feveral prifons, bestowed the office of conflable on Philip de Artois, count d'Eu, Oliver de Clisson having retired into Bretagne, where he defended his lands against the duke with fuch spirit and courage, as at length forced him to feek a reconciliation z. of his miniflers, whom his uncles had procured to be condemned; but he was obliged to banifh them, to gratify those in whose hands he was *.

Hitlory fearce affords any parallel of a court or country His indifmore corrupt, and at the fame time more miferable, than position is that of this unfortunate prince and his fubjects, in confe- augmented by another quence of his misfertune : all was difford and confusion, ingular intrigues, debauchery, and diffention. The dukes of Ber- and unforry and Burgundy ruled the kingdom, excluding the auke of tunale ac-Orleans, under pretence of his youth, from any fhare in the government, and even from the fliadow of power. It was not fo with his duchefs, the daughter of the duke of Milan, and the grand-daughter of king John; young, heautiful, and infinuating, fhe acquired fuch a power over the king, that the governed him at her pleafure; and, which is more extraordinary, it was the only that could govern him, for in the time of his malady he knew noboy elfe, not even the queen b. This influence offended the duchefs of Burgundy extremely, who could not endure to fee fo much court paid to that princefs; and, as is too frequently the cafe, the quarrels between the wives extended themfelves to their hufbands, and produced that furious and implacable hatred, which in its effects was fo pernicious, and in the end was very near proving deftructive to France. To render the duchefs of Orleans odious to the people, it was given out that fhe had bewitched the king; and, to heighten the odium, it was faid that the duke of Orleans had also bewitched the queen: but the most candid writers coufefs, that there was no ground to fufpect any other kind of magic than what flowed from the alliduity of the young and handfome, when, unreftrained by principle or fentiment, they give a loofe to their paffious. When the king, through the care of his phyfician, feemed to be tolerably well recovered, another unlucky and unforefeen accident deprived him again of his fenses . The queen married one of her ladies of honour, a German, to a perfon of diffinction about the court, and the marriage was to be kept with great folemnity at the palace of the queen-dowager, relict of Philip de Valois, Amongst other amufements, there was to be a mafque, which gave occasion to fome young lords to appear in the drefs of favages, made of linen, which fat close to their bodies, covered with rofin, which, while Nantouillet, and Guifai, one of the efquires of the body, were of this party, and the king made the fixth d. This trivial fecret was fo well kept, that, when they came to the ball, they were not known, but their whim was mightily applauded; the duchefs of Berry, feeing him robuft and well-made, laid hold of the king, and told him the would not part with him till the knew who he was. In the mean time, the other five began the dance, when the duke of Orleans, out of levity, making a flew of running a lighted torch against one of the favages, fet his habit on fire, which quickly communicated the flame to the reft, and changed this fcene of wanton mirth into forrow and diffrefs.

His discase returns avithgreat violence

In the midft of their torments, the mafks roared out continually " fave the king, fave the king !" The duchefs of Berry immediately recollected that he must be the mafk which flood by her, and thereupon throwing her robes over him, and wrapping them clofe about him, put out the fire: Nantouillet, by jumping into a ciflern of water, faved his life; the other four were fo terribly burnt that they died in two days; and the king was fo much affected with the fright and with grief, that it caufed a relapfe . After this the king had four or five fits every year to the time of his death. He grew heavy and unealy the evening before the fit, and next morning, as foon as he awaked, appeared either furious or foolifh. Sometimes he was boifterous and cruel, at others melancholy and full of tears; and fometimes he would laugh and play like a child, but knew nobody but the duchefs of Orleans, and would take nothing from any other hand f. In his lucid intervals his uncles took care to amufe him with diversions of every kind, and, to the utmoft of their power, hindered his addicting himfelf at all to bufinefs, under colour of concern for his health : this was of a piece with their politics in the time of his minosity; but they acted more wifely in another respect, fince, contenting themfelves with the annual and entire revenue of the crown, they did not, as before, opprefs the people A,D.1393. with taxes. They fhewed likewife great refpect to the parliament, which now began to fit through the year, with only fome thort vacations, according to the regulations prefcribed by the king, who made feveral other rules, that were fo prudent and ufeful as to be ever fince retained b.

The government of France did all that lay in their Accommopower to compose the schifm that had so long diffurbed dates all the church, and laboured earneftly to perfuade the two with king popes to refign their dignities, to facilitate a measure of Richard II. fo great importance. But the pontiffs, who never could who efagree in any thing before, underflood each other's mind, spoules his in this particular, and concerted their excufes fo well, that Clement, who refided at Avignon, died in poffethon of the papal character; and, notwithftanding the oppolition of the crowned heads, the cardinals of his faction chofe Peter de Luna, a Spaniard, who affumed the name of Benedict XIII. and proved even more intractable than his predeceffor <sup>i</sup>. The truce with England was prolonged from time to time, till at length king Richard II. found it expedient to marry the princefs Ifabel, the daughter of Charles, though a child; upon which they had an interview with each other, and concluded a truce for thirty years. On this occasion Charles prevailed upon the king of England to reftore the important fortrefs of Breft to the duke of Bretagne, who had mortgaged it to his grandfather for an immense fum of money: he also redeemed Cherbourg in Normandy, which belonged to Charles the Noble, king of Navarre, to whom he gave the duchy of Nemours, as an equivalent for his effates in that province, and for all his other pretenfions k. On the other hand, the king of England procured the pardon of Peter Craon, and the restitution of his lands, who, at his return to Paris, fliewed himfelf a most exemplary penitent, and employed his revenues in making fatisfaction to a multitude of perfons whom he had injured 1. However, the humility of the application having effaced the memory of the affront, the flower of the French nobility marched to his affiftance. At the head of these forces was John, duke of Nevers, eldeit fon to the duke of Burgundy, the count de Eu constable of France, the count de la Marche, prince of the blood, the marshal de Boucicaut, the fieur de Coucy, John de Vienne, admiral of France, the princes of Bar, the fieurs Sempi and Tremouille, Rainald de Roie, with upwards of two thoufand gentlemen, at their own expence. Is is agreed, that there never appeared a body of troops better equipped, more warlike, or more wicked P. They forced king Sigifmund to fight the Turks at great difadvantage; the battle was loft entirely through their imprudence, in which the ad-A.D. 1395. miral John de Vienne was killed upon the fpot; the count de Eu, and the fieur de Coucy, died in prifon ; the count de Nevers, the marshal de Boucicaut, and the rest of the princes. were ranfomed at a vaft expence, which did not difpleafe the duke of Burgundy his father, who, under colour of his fon's ranfom, levied twice as much upon the people 9. He left his children to the protection the duke of Burgundy, and to the care of his old enemy, but older friend, Oliver de Cliffon, who, after hi difgrace at the court of France, retired to his own effate in Bretagne, where, with the troops which his own reputation and the affiftance of his friends, particularly of the duke of Orleans, enabled him to affemble, he defended himfelf fo gallantly against the duke, that he proposed a truce and a conference, and fent his fon to Cliffon as a hoftage for his fafety. Cliffon complied with the invitation, and carried the young prince with him .. The duke, amazed and confounded at this act of generofity, after what had pailed between them, frankly granted him his own terms, and ever after confided in him as his beft friend, leaving to him the regency of his dominions when he went to the court of France, and, as the highest testimony of esteem, the care of his children at his death *. How well he merited this act of confidence immediately appeared. He was himfelf ill, and kept his bed at the time of the duke's death. His daughter, the countefs of Penthievre, who had married the competitor to the late duke, proposed to him roundly difpatching the duke's children to make room A.D. 1399. for her own. Instead of making her an answer, Clisson laid hold of the javelin that flood at the head of his bed. and threw it after her as the ran down ftairs; the tumbling through fear and hafte broke her thigh, and, by her lamenels ever after, testified her father's honour and her own difgrace y. Archambaude de Grailli, brother to A.D. 1400. the famous captal de Buch, by the death of the count de -Foix, inherited that country ; but having taken poffession of it without the king's confent, the constable was fent against him with an army; and though he was not very. fuccefsful, yet the count thought fit to come to Paris, where, having made great fubmillions, and done homage to the king, he was received into high favour, the rather, because he frankly declared that he never would have quitted the English interest, but for the murder of Richard of Bourdeaux, the fon of his beloved mafter the Black Prince *. 'The king's difeafe was now grown to fuch a height, that, even during his lucid intervals, his brain was fo weak, that it was improper to trouble him with bufinefs. In this fituation he granted commiffions to the proper officers, for executing juffice and expediting public affairs b. The duke of Burgundy making a tour into his own dominions, the duke and duchefs of Orleans made for good use of that opportunity, and of the influence they had over the king and queen, that they prevailed upon Charles, who was then in his fenfes, to grant a commiffion, creating the duke his brother lieutenant-general and governor of the realm, as fuch times as, through the vifitation of God, he was himfelf unable to administer public affairs . The duke of Orleans, in virtue of this commiffion, imposed a general and heavy tax, from which even the ecclefiaftics were not exempted. The weather being very unfeasonable, and the fcarcity of necessaries great throughout the whole kingdom, this measure gave the duke of Burgundy great advantage, inalinuch as, at his return, he avowed publicly in parliament, that what was alleged of his confent to that edict was an abtolute falfity, fince, notwithstanding an offer had been made him of an enormous fum of money, he had constantly refused it. The two dukes arming, and each of them having his allies, the kingdom was in great danger of being torn by a civil war. At length the duke of Bourbon interfering as

The duke of Burgundy fecures the ducky of Bietagne and his brethren to the French inter A.

In quality of tutor to the young duke of Bretagne and his brothers, the duke of Burgundy certainly rendered a very confiderable fervice to the crown of France, by bringing the three young princes, John, Arthur, and Giles to Paris ; a flep which entirely defeated the views of Henry IV. of England, who, by marrying their mother the duchefs-dowager, had in view ftrengthening the English interest in Bretagne . The duke of Orleans, who, though inferior in age and prudence, was to the full as ambitious as the duke of Burgundy, fent a challenge to king Henry; who answered, that, as a king, he could not take notice of fuch letters if they did not come from a crowned head. The duke replied that he was no king, but a traitor, a murderer of his prince, and an ufurper. Henry rejoined in the fame language, that the duke was a turbulent and ambitious prince, who had bewitched his brother that he might feize the royal authority, which he was unable to manage. Thefe disputes occasioned animofities, and even hoftilitics, between the two nations; which, though entirely founded in pique and felf-intereft, yet both fides en-A.D.1400. deavoured to colour by fpecious pretences f. The French exclaimed, that the marriage portion received with queen Ifabel was not reftored, a charge which the English admitted, but offered to deduct it out of what was full due for king John's ranfom ". The conftable Sancerre dying, the king beftowed the fword upon Charles, lord of Albret, his coufin, a young man very nobly born, but without experience. The queen was delivered of a fon, who fucceeded afterwards to the crown h. The marshal de Boucicaut was fent to command in Genoa, where he governed with fo much feverity that he rendered his nation odious. The death of the duke of Milan, father to the duchefs of Orleans, weakened the intereft of the French in Italy; and the fchifm ftill continuing, ferved to diffurb and diffract their affairs; fo that the refidence of one of the pretenders to the papacy at Avignon did them no good i.

He was fucceeded France. in the greatest part of his dominious by his fon John, count of Nevers, who, in point of ambition was equal, in courage fuperior, but in abilities, or at leaft in moderation, very unlike his father. The queen and the duke of Orleans excluded him entirely from the government; and if they had afted with any tolerable temper and prudence, A.D. 1404. they might very probably have preferved the authority they had gained ; but while they had nothing fo much at heart as this, they acted as if it had been their intention to loke it. They took all poffible methods, mean as well as oppreflive, to amafs wealth, and, when they had acquired it, they fpent it as unworthily 1. The queen was faid to fend large fums into Germany, that, in cafe of any accident, fhe might have wherewithal to fubfift; as for the duke, he was continually purchasing lands, though he would never pay his debts. Their courts were numerous and fplendid, while those of the king and his children were fo ill provided, that the people began to murmur. The king, in one of his lucid intervals, hearing how his children were uled, fent for the dauphin's governels, and upon her owning that they fometimes wanted food, and often cloaths, the king, fetching a deep figh, gave her a gold cup, out of which he drank, adding, that pomp was ridiculous where necessaries were wanting m. He ordered, however, a general council to be called of all the princes of the blood, to which the duke of Burgundy was exprefly fummoned. He came, accompanied with a confiderable force; and then the dukes of Berry and Bourbon, the kings of Navarre and Sicily, declared openly against the queen and the duke of Orleans, who thereupon withdrew to Melun, and attempted to carry away the dauphin and the king's children ; but the duke of Burgundy, to A D. 1405. whofe daughter he was contracted, and whofe fon was to ---

Things continued for fome time in very great diforder, infomuch that a civil war was apprehended; the duke of Orleans's party having attacked the duke of Berry in his houfe in the night; but being repulfed, and finding his party too weak, and himfelf too much hated, to do any thing by force, he acquiefced in a provision, that, during the times of the king's abfence (which was a phrafe they made ufe of to express his madness,) the kingdom should be governed by a council of ftate, composed of the princes of the blood; upon which a kind of outfide reconciliation enfued °.

As the two dukes continued to hate one another as paffionately as ever, and were reciprocally framing plots to each other's prejudice, the other princes of the blood perfuaded them rather to fhew their courage and their power by expelling the English out of the kingdom : pursuant to this advice, the duke of Orleans marched into Guienne, where the conftable had already taken feveral places, and extorted a great fum of money from the inhabitants of Bourdeaux; and the duke of Burgundy at the fame time, at the head of very numerous forces, entered Picardy P. They could not have a more favourable opportunity of atchieving what they proposed ; for Henry IV. found himfelf fo embarraffed by fecret confpiracies and open rebellions, that it was not in his power to carry on the war A.D.1406, with France as he would otherwife have done. Yet both the princes failed; the duke of Orleans riling before Blaye, which he had belieged, and, on his return to Paris, procuring the king's orders to the duke of Burgundy to quit the fiege of Calais, in which he had made very little progrefs 9. These disappointments made the princes more furious; the duke of Burgundy attributing his difgrace entirely to the duke of Orleans; and the latter affirming, that, during his campaign in Guienne, he had not been properly fupplied with money ; new intrigues were commenced, new violences committed, and a new civil war was on the point of breaking out, when the duke of Berry interposed, who had been very ill treated by the duke of Orleans, and who had no great caufe to be fatisfied with the duke of Burgundy; but they were both his nephews, and his interceffion was fo cordial, and his whole conduct fo impartial, that, overcome with his importunities, they confented to a reconciliation, which was fealed with the to perfuade the duke of Burgundy not to add the infult on the king's authority to the death of the duke of Orleans, but to qualify things in the best manner possible, and to demand in general terms a royal pardon. The duke making use of his fuperior force, rejected all propositions of accommodation, marched triumphantly to Paris, demanded and forced an audience from the king, infifted upon justifying himfelf publicly, which he did by the mouth of his apologist Dr. John Petit, who, in the prefence of the dauphin and the princes of the blood, defamed the deceafed duke of Orleans as a tyrant and a traitor, inferring from thence, that, inftead of confidering the duke of Burgundy as a criminal, they ought to refpect him as the king's beft fubject, and the deliverer of the kingdom *. This defence was heard with filence and fecret diflike: and the queen and most of the princes of the blood withdrawing, the duke, who had the king in his power, obtained from him as full a pardon as he could defire or devife. He was not fatisfied with this, but obliged him likewife to remove the admiral, and to appoint the Sieur de Chatillon to that office, who was in his intereft y. A fedition at Liege, where the people had expelled his brother-in-law, who pretended to be their bishop without being a prieft, induced the duke of Burgundy to march with all his forces to his affiftance. At first the queen and the princes of the blood thought of fortifying Paris, of railing an army and meeting him in the field; but finding the citizens were most of them in his interest, and that it would be difficult to raife the fupplies neceffary for carrying on a war, they judged it more prudent to retire, with what forces they had, to Tours, which retreat they executed with great prudence, and carried the king with them. The duke of Burgundy fent the count of Hainault to treat with the queen and dauphin, to whom the king had committed the management of public affairs b. He was well received, and fent back with the lord Montague, who had the direction of the finances, and who offered to him, as the final refolution of the court, two propolitions; first, that he should make a clear and fatisfactory fubmiffion to the king in public; and next, that he should abftain from coming into his prefence for fome years; which A.D.1408. offer he rejected with contempt, and fo terrified Montague, that, to make his peace, he promifed to render him all the fervice that was in his power c. But, notwithstanding he gave law in this manner to the king and the princes of his family, he loft that credit which hitherto he had maintained through the greateft part of his kingdom, by the licentious behaviour of his troops, and by the miferies which this civil war occafioned, which was now imputed to his ambition °.

Within three days after this folemn act, the duke of Orleans being, as usual, at the queen's lodgings, where he fpent his evenings, a perfon came in hafte to inform him that the king defired to fpeak with him immediately, on an affair of importance; the duke, mounted on his mule, preceded by two pages, and followed only by two of his domestics, fct out for the Hotel de St. Pol, where the king lodged, and in his paffage was attacked by a company of about twenty ruffians, commanded by one whom he had removed from a trifling office in the king's fervice, who with his pole-ax cut off his hand that refted on the fide of his mule '. He cried out immediately, " I am the duke of Orleans !" It is he, replied the affailin, for whom we wait, and with a fecond blow cleft his skull. One of his fervants, a Fleming, endeavoured to cover his body with his own, and was dif-patched with him. The affaffins made their efcape with fuch expedition and address, that they were none of them known t. This execrable action was committed on the 23d, or, as fome fay, on the 22d of November. The author who for fome days was not known or fulpected, appearing publicly, and affifting at the funeral of the duke. But the provoft of Paris being fent for by the council, to know what difcoveries or what enquiries he had made, he demanded and obtained leave to fearch the houfes of the princes themfelves. The king of the Two Sicilies looking at this time upon the duke of Burgundy, faw him change countenance; and foon after he confessed to that prince, and to the duke of Berry, that it was by his order that the duke of Orleans was killed ; upon which they advifed him to retire, and he took their advice, accompanied only by five perfons. The admiral affembled a company of one hundred and twenty knights, with whom he would have purfued him, but the council interposed, and obliged him to defift ". The duke of Bourbon expressed great difpleafure that he was not arrefted; and equally abhorring the wickedness of fome, and ashamed at the publianimity of others, left the court, and retired to his own eftate. The council being informed that the duke of Burgundy was railing troops, and had published a manifesto, in which he avowed and juftified the murder, were much alarmed.

The whole court returned to Paris, where the duke of Burgundy finding it extremely difficult to maintain himfelf by mere dint of fuperior force, began to practife on the princes, and by a great flew of refpect drew over the duke of Berry, as, by fair promifes of doing him juitice, he alfo did Charles the Noble, king of Navarre, who had been neglected and hardly treated. The queen, feeing the duke's authority fo well fupported, practifed in her turn on the mind of the dauphin, and engaged him to retire with her to Melun<sup>g</sup>. The duke took the occafion of her absence, and a relapse of the king, to feize the lord of Montague, mafter of the king's houfhold, who had the fupreme direction of the finances. This man was immenfely rich, exceffively vain, and univerfally hated; his procefs was made, the rack forced him to become an evidence against himself, and, being thus convicted, he was publicly beheaded. At the time of his death he declared his confession to be false, and extorted by pain; vindicated the memory of the duke of Orleans, and thewed more firmnefs than could have been expected from his former courfe of life<sup>h</sup>. He had two brothers, the one archbishop of Sens, and chancellor of France, the other bishop of Paris; and his daughters were married into great families, but were unable to fave him : however, the fentence was afterwards reverfed, and his memory vindicated by a judicial process, at the expence of a convent which he had founded; who fold their plate to defray the expences of the fuit; a circumstance that deferved perpetual memory i. When the king recovered, he was amazed at the fate of his minister; but, being told that he fuffered by due courfe of law, he was, or at leaft feemed to be fatisfied. and that the king fould appoint new ministers of his own choice. The duke of Burgundy executed this treaty fairly; and, after taking leave of the king, with great testimonies of duty and respect, withdrew into his own dominions; but the duke of Orleans, though often fummoned, would never difmifs his troops, but, on the contrary, fecretly omitted nothing that could be done to extend his party; and to augment his forces °.

At Paris the king and his people were in great hopes they fhould, at length, enjoy fome degree of quiet; the new ministry were frugal and circumspect; they were fenfible, that not only their authority but their fafety depended on their behaving honourably; and, from this principle, they were very attentive to their duty. But. while they were thus employed, the court was alarmed by letters from the duke of Burgundy, affuring them that the princes were about to raife new troubles, in order to make themfelves mafters of the perfons of the king and dauphin, and of the government; for which reafon he advised the king to make a new governor of Paris, and to provide for his own fecurity P. The inhabitants of Paris opposed this measure, because the duke of Berry was still their governor. The king laboured to compose these troubles; the queen undertook to mediate; and the duke of Orleans feemed to acquiefce, as the duke of Burgundy really did. But the former, when he found himfelf ftrong enough, challenged the latter; and, throwing off the mask, declared war 9. The queen also espoused the cause of the duke of Orleans; a circumstance which so enraged the Parifians, that they now defired the duke of Berry might be removed, and the count de St. Pol appointed in his flead . They had their defire, and had very foon after reafon to repent it. The first act of the count's government was railing a kind of guard, confitting of five hundred butchers, who, having once arms put into their hands, made the whole city tremble. All France was now divided into two parties; fuch as favoured the duke of Orleans, who, from his father-in-law (for he was again married) were flyled Armagnacs, and those who adhered to the duke of Burgundy, who, from one Caboche, were ftvled Cabochines; the former, by way of diffinction, A. The duke of Orleans advanced towards him with a numerous army; but, when they were on the point of engaging, the duke of Burgundy decamped; for many of his Flemith lords, having ferved their time, began to retire: the duke of Orleans, laying hold of this opportunity, caufed his forces to block up Paris, which he must have reduced, if, when it was leaft expected, the duke of Burgundy had not fuddenly entered it with a fmall body of choice troops. This fuccour foon changed the face of affairs; the people of Paris recovered their fpirits, and, having joined the duke of Burgundy, recovered feyeral places, and at length conftrained the duke of Orleans to decamp and retire t.

never flooped to propofe any terms of accommodation. The mystery was foon revealed, by the landing of the duke of Clarence in Normandy, with a complete army from England. The princes, who, while they blocked up Paris, accufed the duke of Burgundy of treafon, for having accepted a body of fix thousand English auxiliaries, commanded by the earl of Arundel, had notwithftanding concluded a treaty with king Henry in the month of May, by which they promifed to obtain the reftitution of all the places he claimed in France, provided he fent an army to their affiftance; and upon this relief, which was now come, they depended *. In the fituation things now flood in, both parties were inclined to peace, but neither would propofe it. The count of Savoy, who was nearly related to the duke of Berry, and who had efpoufed the duke of Burgundy's daughter, drew them out of this difficulty; and, the terms being previoully fettled, the dauphin had the honour of dictating a peace. The old treaties were renewed, and fworn to afresh; the duke of Berry gave up the place, and had it reftored to him again; the princes renounced their treaty with England, and their league against the duke of Burgundy : and, on the other hand, the king reinflated those whom he had removed. It was alfo agreed, that all names of reproach fhould be abolifhed, and great rejoicings were made for this new reconci-A.D. 1412. liation; which was fealed with fresh oaths and protestations on both fides ". There ftill remained one great difficulty: this was, how to difpofe of the English army, which had committed great devaitation, and was now advancing in full march towards Bourges. The duke of Orleans had fent for them, and he was to pay them; but he had no money; he was conftrained to give his brother the count of Angoulefme, and other nobles as hoftages, till he could raife it; and the duke of Clarence having accepted thefe, directed his march to Guienne. By this time, or at leaft foon after, Henry the Fourth had breathed his laft, and his fon Henry the Fifrh was feated on the throne z.

The Burgundians become obnoxious to the dauphin Lewis duke of Exiemne. However fhort the flruggle may be, the miferies of a civil war are long felt; the dukes of Berry and Burgundy returned with the king to Paris, and feeing clearly, that a war with England was likely to enfue, for which they were totally unprovided in all refpects, they called, or ad-

The affembly being difmified, Lewis dauphin of France, a very high-fpirited young prince, refolved to take the actual as well as nominal direction of affairs upon himfelf. Haying fome perfons about him of good fenfe, he began to make various regulations, which had an air of public fpirit. This, like all the attempts of reformation during the prefent reign, commenced with the perfecution of those who had been employed in the finances, and of whom the flates had loudly complained b. At the head of thefe was Pierre, or Peter des Effards, the creature of the duke of Burgundy, who had been raifed to the fupreme direction of the finances by the deftruction and death of Montague. Effards, finding himfelf preffed for two millions of crowns, produced to the dauphin the duke of Burgundy's receipts, and at the fame time acquainted him. that the duke had formed a defign of affaffinating all the princes of the houfe of Orleans, or, as others report, the three dukes of Berry, Orleans, and Bourbon . This difcovery reftored him to the dauphin's good graces, who thereupon made use of him to fecure the city of Paris: which he was to do by taking poffeffion of the Baftile with a body of men that might be depended upon. Effards was fo cautious, that he would take no flep without the order of the duke of Burgundy as well as of the dauphin : and the latter applying to the former for fuch an order, he prefently divined the truth, but figned it at the fame time as if he had not had the leaft fufpicion d.

The affair being conducted with great filence and fe- The dancrecy, Effards became mafter of the fortrefs without the phin brings leaft diffurbance; but he was fearce mafter of it before he back the found it invefted by an infinite croud of people, with the Orleans band of butchers at their head, under the command of and his Simon de Caboche, and John de Troye a furgeon. Thefe friends, were quickly after joined by two knights, who were declared partizans of the duke of Burgundy; a circumfance which made it evident enough from whence the florm came. The dauphin, therefore, was forced to have recourse to that prince to allay it; and he, pretending to ufe his influence on the people on his behalf, perfuaded Pierre de Effards to furrender; to whom he gave affurances of friendship and protection till he came to the fcaffold, where, notwithflanding this ulage, he behaved with great decency and dignity, without uttering any complaints but of himfelf, for having, through a principle of ambition, been instrumental in Montague's death . The fame ruffians furrounded and attacked the palace, in which the dauphin refided, forced feveral of his friends and fervants from his prefence, amongst whom was his uncle Lewis of Bavaria, and put James de la Riviere, his chamberlain, to death. The fame infolent rabble conftrained the king, who was now in his fenfes, with the dauphin, the dukes of Berry and Burgundy, to go to the parliament, and register edicts of their framing; and fo low were they fallen, that, either to make their court to, or for fear of the populace, they wore white hoods f. On this occasion Arnold de Corbie, chancellor of France, was deposed, and feveral other perfons of rank, were replaced as these reformers thought fit. Helion de Jaqueville, whom they had made captain of Paris, hearing fiddles one evening in the dauphin's apartment, broke in, with a croud of his attendants, and, though the duke of Burgundy was prefent, treated him, and those who were about him, with the utmost indignity, and even put them in danger of of their lives, though the duke pretended all the time to pacify them, and often whifpered the dauphin, that he should not let the people fee he was afraid '. It is no wonder that prince flould think a life like this infupportable, or endeavour at all events to free himfelf. The method he took was to write in his father's name, and with his confent, to the duke of Orleans; who, communicating his letter to the reft of the princes, they fpeedily affembled a fufficient force, and advanced towards Paris. The king declared his inclination to peace; conferences were for this purpole fet on foot, and John Juvenal des Urfins, advocate-general, having difpofed the better fort of people in Paris to exert themfelves, the citizens declared for peace. The Cabochins endeavoured to revive the old fpirit; but it was too late, and fome of them being flain, the reft quitted the city, and withdrew into Flan-

Upon this revolution the dukes of Bavaria and Bar, who The duke of were both prifoners, recovered their liberty; the former Burgundy was made governor of the Bastile, and the latter of the Jets on foot tower of the Louvre. The reft of the princes repaired fre/b infpeedily to Paris, where they were well received, and the duke of Burgundy as univerfally condemned as he had been lately admired. This odium the duke of Anjou, called by courtefy the king of the Sicilies, carried fo far, as to fend him back his daughter, whom he had contracted to the prince his fon; which affront created an irreconcileable hatred between the two families<sup>i</sup>. In the mean time a treaty of marriage was fet on foot between Henry the Fifth of England, and the king's daughter the princefs Catherine, which was managed on one fide by the duke of York, and, on the other, by the princes lately returned to court; but, for the prefent, this produced nothing more than a truce. Before the close of the year came am- A.D.1413. baffadors from the duke of Burgundy, to make his excufes to the king for quitting Paris in fo abrupt a manner, and to affure him of his duty and fubmiflion k. The true defign of the embally, however, was to know the difpolition of the courtiers and citizens, and to encourage and keep up the fpirit of his friends. He affured them, not only there but in feveral other great towns, that he was raifing forces fecretly, in order to come to the deliverance of the king and dauphin; the latter having written to him, as he affirmed, letters in very ftrong terms, reprefenting the confinement and diffrefs in which they were, and importuning him without delay, and without paying any respect to letters of another tenor that he might receive from them, to affemble an army and come to their affiftance 1. His friends believed all that he faid, while those of the duke of Orleans and the princes, and even the princes themfelves, knew not well what to think with respect to his affertions, or what measures to take to prevent his bringing about another change, as fudden as that which themfelves had effected m.

As

Charles marches ogainst the duke of Burgundy.

As the king was at this time indifpofed, the queen called a great council, in which the dauphin, the princes of the blood, the great lords, and particularly the count de Armagnac, the chancellor of France, the heads of the univerfity, which in those days had great weight, and some of the principal citizens of Paris were prefent. The first ftep that was taken was to impose an oath of fecrecy: then the chancellor, in a long fpeech, laid open the miffortunes of the flate; infifted on the dauphin's youth, the vivacity of his fpirit, his pronenefs to pleafure, his negleft of business, and the facility with which he was milled by fome idle young men who were about him. The dauphin was furprifed, and on the point of fhewing his anger, when the princes and great lords, in their turns, fpoke to the fame purpofe, and declared, that the fafety of the ftate depended upon fome speedy and effectual remedy. This was prefently applied, by removing those from about him who were fulpected, and efpecially one who was believed to have prevailed on him to write to the duke of Burgundy". The dauphin was forced to acquiefce, to write letters, requiring the duke to lay down his arms, and others to the principal towns in the kingdom, denving and difavowing the facts contained in the duke of Burgundy's manifesto. The king, recovering, acted with still greater warmth; the university condemned the apology of Dr. John Petit for the murder of the duke of Orleans, as full of heretical and deteftable doctrine. The duke of Berry, as governor of Paris, difpofed every thing in a proper manner for its defence, by the advice of the count de Armagnac, father-in-law to the duke of Orleans. It was by his perfualion that the better fort of people took arms and did duty, and by his perfuation the princes of the blood, in their turns, went their rounds every night. The dauphin, to clear himfelf from all fufpicion, was remarkably active and fleady . The duke of Burgundy advanced with a great army; made himfelf mafter of Compeigne and Soiffons; had St. Denis betrayed to him, and brought his army within fight of Paris He next fent a herald to acquaint the citizens, that, at the express defire of the king and dauphin, he was come to deliver them out of a shameful confinement, and therefore demanded admittance. The count de Armagnac received the meffage with contempt, and fent the herald back without anfwer. The duke approached the gates with his army in order of battle ; but finding every thing in perfect order, and not the least tumult or confusion, though he continued there fome hours, withdrew, and foon after retired into his own territories P. The king then published a manifesto; in which, beginning with the murder of his brother, he represented the duke as the great author of the calamities of France; declared him a public enemy, and exhorted all his good fubjects to treat him in that light. A potent army being quickly formed, the king, accompanied by the dauphin, put himfelf at the head of it, reduced Compeigne by capitulation, and having taken Soiffons by affault, caufed two perfons of diffinction, who defended it, to be beheaded. He proceeded from thence into Artois, where he was met by the duke of Brabant and the countefs of Hainault, brother and fifter to the duke of Burgandy; who interceded for him, and affured the king, that he defired nothing more than to come and justify himfelf to his majefty. The king anfwered with great firmnefs, " If that be all, let him come with a proper train : if he has any thing to demand we are ready to do him justice; if he will confess his errors and demand pardon, he shall have it." The king then wrote to the states of Flanders, to know whether they meant to make the quarrel of their count their own, upon which they fent deputies, who declared roundly, that, whatever conduct the duke of Burgundy, their count, thought fit to purfue, they would behave themfelves as his majefty's good fubjects. The dukes of Orleans and Bourbon, with the archbishop of Sens, refused to fubscribe; alleging they had never broke the former peace, which was the balis of this; but the dauphin, fenlible of his power, faid, " My lords, if you mean to keep the peace, you must fubscribe;" and they complied, though with a bad grace. The king returned in triumph to Paris, and his fubjects once more entertained hopes of feeing the public tranquility fettled on a folid bafis ".

baffadors, who were perfons of the first quality in the kingdom, expressed the like disposition in very strong terms; but, from the propositions they made, one might be led to fuspect their fincerity; for, baving first demanded the crown of France, and afterwards many vaft conceffions, they at length fluck to three points s. The first was the entire reflitution of all that was flipulated by the treaty of Bretigny, which, through this whole negociation, was stiled the great treaty; next a moiety of the county of Provence; and, laftly, what was still remaining of king John's ranfom; which points being once adjusted, the king would treat of a marriage with the princefs Catherine, then about fourteen, provided he might be affured of having with her a round million. The French court was exceedingly embarraffed, as perceiving plainly that the English were well apprised of the distracted state of their affairs; and therefore they offered great cellions, together with the princels Catherine, and a fortune of fix hundred thousand crownst. The English ministers acknowleged they had no power to conclude the marriage, and returned home by the way of Honfleur. They were prefently followed by a fplendid embaffy from France, at the head of which was the archbilhop of Bourges, who gradually advanced the fortune to within fifty thousand crowns of what had been demanded ; but, perceiving that the English minifters only amufed him, as their ambaffador had been amused at Paris, and that they were on the point of invading France, he demanded an audience of leave, and returned with his colleagues ". This prelate acquainted the king, that the parliament, influenced by the clergy, had embarked the English monarch in a war to preferve their own power and possefions; that there was no doubt to be made of his reviving his claim to the kingdom, and very great reason to believe, that the duke of Burgundy still held a correspondence in England. Before any great use could be made of this intelligence, Henry, embarking with a potent army at Southampton, landed in Normandy, after defeating a French squadron, and invested Harfleur, at the mouth of the river Seine w. It is highly probable the French ministers had depended upon a party they had in England, at the head of which was Richard earl of Cambridge, the lord treasurer Scroop, and Sir Thomas

Grey; most of our historians fay, that their defign was to kill the king, but it is more probable, that they meant to carry off a part of the army, and to proclaim the right heir of Richard the Second; for the fupport of which project they had flipulated with the court of France an advance of a million of livres; but, the whole bufinefs being difcovered, the French faved their money, and the perfons engaged in this plot loft their heads x.

The conftable d'Albret, who commanded in Normandy, He maker a had a confiderable army under his command, in the neigh-bourhood of Rouen, with which he did nothing confider-takes Harable; yet the garrifon of Harfleur defended themfelves fleur, and with great courage and spirit, but were at length com- marches pelled to capitulate, and to agree, that in cafe they were lowards not relieved, they would render the place on the 18th of Calais. September; but, when the day came, they very imprudently endeavoured to clude the promife they had made; a want of good faith which fo provoked Henry, that he caufed a general attack to be made, carried the place fword in hand, referved a few perfons of diffinction prifoners, put the reft to the fword, and gave the town to be pillaged by his army". His fatisfaction at this fuccefs was very much qualified by the miferable condition in which he found his army, harraffed and diminished in a moift climate and marfhy foil, the flux prevailing amongft them, the feafon advanced, and the weather fo bad, that the beft part of his fleet was retired into Calais road. In these circumstances he took a resolution of marching thither by land; the little opposition he had hitherto received perfuading him that he flould meet with nothing to impede him<sup>2</sup>. He quickly difcovered his miftake; for the king, the dauphin, and the reft of the princes of the blood, having taken the field, he faw his forces in a manner furrounded. He paffed, however, the river Somme, where he found it fordable; but when he was on the other fide, he discovered the French army in the plain near the little village of Agincourt*. The king being ill, the dauphin and the duke of Berry were forced to remain with him; fo that the command devolved upon the conftable, who made but an indifferent choice of the field of hattle, which was, in truth, little better than a quagmire; but he took his measures to hinder the enemy's march fo effectually, and king Henry found the difpute fo very unequal, that he had recourfe to a negociation, in which he offered to reftore Harfleur, and to pay the expences of the war, provided he was allowed a free paffage to Calais., The conftable, the marfhal de Boucicaut, and moft of the old officers, were for accepting this offer, which, they faid, was gaining a victory without blood; but the young nobility, particularly the duke of Bourbon and Alençon, were of another opinion, and the herald was fent back without anfwer b.

The conftable, however, would not fight till he had the king's express orders, who was by this time recovered. His army confifted of about fixty thousand men, though fome writers make them double that number. The Eng. lifh were about twenty-two thousand, of whom near one half had the flux. On the 25th of October, about nine in the morning, the armies were in fight; the English had their archers in the center, the gens d'arms on their right, and the infantry on their left, all perfectly well posted, and twelve hundred choice archers in different ambufcades. The army of France had fo many dukes, counts, and great lords, who were above being commanded, that all was in confusion from the very beginning. To fnew that their courage was equal to their rank, they were all in the first line; fo that the bulk of the army was without any officers of diffinction. They marched precipitately as to an affured victory; whereas the English advanced very flowly, and difcharged fuch flights of arrows as did great execution. When they drew near, the archers, perceiving they were out of breath, charged them with great vigour, broke them in lefs than half an hour, and then fell upon the main body, which made very little refiftance, as having no officer of confequence to command them. Henry, with his gens d'arms, put an end to the difpute, bearing down fuch feparate corps as here and there endeavoured to remain firm c. eight thousand gentlemen of family, and about two thoufand private men 4. There were likewife fourteen thoufand prifoners, and amongst these the dukes of Orleans and Bourbon, the counts of Eu, Vendofme, and Richmond, the marshal de Boucicaut, and about two thousand knights. The news of this defeat being carried to Roueu, amazed the king and those who were about him. The furprife was still greater at Paris, from an apprehension that the duke of Burgundy would return into France with an army. The duke de Bretagne, with a great body of troops, joined the poor remains of the French army within fifteen miles of the field of battle; and if, without lofs of time, they had attacked Henry again, they might very probably have repaired the mifchief; but no attempt of this fort being made, he arrived fafely at Calais, where he began inftantly to take measures for the next campaign.

In the mean time the duke of Burgundy acted a double, or at least a perplexed part; he fent Henry a defiance for the death of his brother the duke of Brabant, at the fame turn the time he marched, with a great body of cavalry, towards public mis-Paris; a motion which augmented the public confusion. fortune to He fent deputies to defire an audience of the king, who were to fee in what fituation the court flood, which was now returned to Paris; they were haughtily treated by the dauphin, who charged them to command their mafter, in his name, to difband; but, before their departure, the dauphin was feized with a dyfentery, of which he died A.D.1415. in a few days, not without fuspicion . He was about nineteen, tall, robuft, and active in his perfon; eager and defirous of having a great measure of power, though at the fame time he hated bufinefs: much given to wine and women, and if not really poifoned by his father-inlaw, he fell a victim to his own vices. into his own territories, and fo harraffed his army in his retreat, as to render him contemptible even in the fight of the people of Paris'. In the king's lucid intervals, the constable gave him fo true an infight into his affairs, made him comprehend fo clearly how they might be reftored. and fo fully convinced him of his own fidelity, that he made him fuperintendant of the finances; fo that, in effect, the whole power civil and military was lodged in his hands 3. He acted fo refolutely, that he broke intirely the faction of Burgundy in Paris, executed feveral of the duke's emiffaries, purged the university, and diffolved fuch of the corporations as were devoted to his intereft h. He alfo made a tour into Normandy, where he gained fome advantages over the earl of Dorfet, caufed Harfleur to be blocked up by fea; but the Genoefe veffels, being but half-manned, were defeated by the English, and the place The emperor Sigifmund made a tour to Paris, relieved. in order to engage the king to concur in the measures taken in the council of Constance to put an end to the schifm, by deposing all the three popes, Gregory the Seventh, Benedict the Thirteenth, and John the Twenty-third : he was received with all poffible marks of refpect, and treated, during his ftay, with all imaginable marks of kindnels and efteem, in hopes that, by his influence, a peace might be concluded with England; but, taking offence because he was not allowed to act as a fovereign while in the French dominions, he made a fhort turn, and, inftead of remaining a mediator, became the ally of Henry the Fifth, and fent his old friend Charles a letter of defiance<sup>i</sup>. But what embarrafied the court most was the behaviour of John duke of Touraine, who, by the death of his brother, was become dauphin. He was at this time in Hainault, where he married Jaqueline the daughter and heirefs of the count, who afterwards efpoufed the duke of Bedford k. He was about eighteen, and, being A.D. 1416. either perfuaded or awed by the count of Hainault, entered into the interefts of the duke of Burgundy, and came with his father in-law, efcorted by a body of troops; but refused to go to Paris, to pay his duty to his father, unles the duke of Burgundy was recalled; or rather the count of Hainault made this declaration, in his name, to the queen<sup>1</sup>.

This young prince had an imposthume in his ear, which, breaking inwardly, had choaked which him. The faction of Burgundy being able to make no mands more use of him living, charged his death upon the constable de Armagnac, without either proof or probability. The conftable, to pay them in their own coin, afferted, that the emiffaries of the duke of Burgundy had poifoned Burgundy. the dauphin Lewis ". But the duke, feeing that flories of this kind made no lafting impression, digested all the. grievances of the nation into a kind of manifesto.' This he fent to most of the great towns in the kingdom, inviting them to join with him in a league for the public good ; which had the greater effect, as the dukes of Berry and Anjou were lately dead, and the reft of the princes of the blood prifoners in England"; but, after all, perhaps his fchemes had failed, if, in the midft of thefe miferies and misfortunes, there had not happened a new division at court °. The dauphin, entirely governed by the constable, confented to seize great quantities of plate and jewels, which the queen his mother had deposited in various convents and churches, and applied it for the public fervice. The queen, in high difcontent, retired to Vincennes; where she kept a very splendid court, the expence of which little fuited the ftate of the kingdom, or the diversions which were fuch as could not be reconciled either to the dignity of her rank or the modefly of her fex P. The conftable, an auftere man, could not fee his mafter thus difhonoured in filence; he mentioned it to him therefore, and the king, making a tour to Vincennes, received fuch fatisfaction from his enquiries, that he caufed one of her gallants to be put to death, and banifhed her and her daughter Catherine to Tours. Henry the Fifth, landing with a new army in Normandy, conquered a great part of that province, the conftable having been obliged to recall the greatest part of the troops from. thence, in order to oppose them to the duke of Burgundy; whom he baffled in various attempts, and might probably have obliged to refire once more into his own dominions, if the queen had not, forgetting her rank, her duty, and her character, to gratify her revenge, written to him, and demanded his protection 4. She republished an old edict, by which, in the minority of her eldeft fon, the king had declared her regent; of which fhe now refumed the title and authority. She fixed the feat of her government at Troye, where the created a new chancellor, a new parliament, and formed a new great feal. She gave the title of conftable of France to the duke of Lorrain, declaring the count de Armagnac unworthy of that dignity; but, though the was bountiful in beftowing titles, yet all the power was referved to the duke of Burgundy, who made a very bold attempt to furprife Paris; which, though very well concerted, did not fueceed t.

A general spirit of falfehood and deceit prevails through all courts at this period, and defroys all credit.

It would require a volume of no inconfiderable fize to explain all the dark and infidious practices that were at this time carried on, and which plainly demonstrate, that the extreme mifery brought on the French nation was owing to nothing but the corruption of their manners; which having, on the one hand, introduced a luxury unknown to former times, excited, on the other, a paffion for wealth and power, which quickly flifed all principle . Hence the very end of negociating was loft; for inftead of feeking to put a ftop to prevent difputes, by an amicable and equitable decifion, the parties aimed only at deceiving each other, and kept faith no longer than they thought it their interest to keep it. The duke of Burgundy had, by letters patent under his hand and feal, acknowleged Henry the Fifth for the lawful owner of the French crown, though certainly he never intended to fet it on his head '. The French princes were fo uncafy at their imprifonment, and faw fo little hopes of being delivered, that they likewife entered into a negociation with Henry, the bafis of which was their beginning to have a good opinion of his title, and the object of it the procuring leave for the duke of Bourbon to go to France, there to negociate a peace upon the king's terms; and, if that could not be brought about, then to acknowlege his title, and do homage to him as their lawful prince ". The duke went, and failed; but, at his return, himfelf and the reft of the princes refufed to perform their engagements, for which they were all clofely imprifoned, and Henry, against his will, was forced to depend upon his fword. This reluctancy of his did not at all proceed from his diffidence of defeating the French army, of which, in the prefent ftate of things, he was in a manner fure ; but conquest was not to be obtained but by a numerous army, and he was already to effectually undone by the expence, that he had been forced to pawn his crown and all his jewels to furnish the neceffary supplies for the next campaign; and this, notwithstanding he had received from his fubjects all that it was in their power to give ". In the mean time a negociation had been fet on foot for reconciling the queen and the dauphin's party in France ; in which fuch difficulties occurred, that the minifters employed on both fides agreed to leave the terms to be preferibed by the legates of pope Martin the Fifth. ' Their decree was, that the king thould devolve his authority on the dauphin and the duke of Burgundy jointly, to which both parties willingly agreed; yet this did not produce a peace; for the conftable de Armagnac, though he could not open the eves of the dauphin, prevailed upon the chancellor to declare that he would not put the feal to fuch a treaty ". For this he is highly blamed by moft of the French hiftorians, as if he had manifestly facrificed the public to his private intereft; but fure, if they had attended to his reafon, they could fcarce have done him this injustice; for he alleged, that he could not think of delivering the royal perfon and power into the hands of one who had made a treaty against both; which, being denied by the duke of Burgundy, was the caufe that the writers of those times cenfured the conftable, as fuppoling that he invented this as a pretence; but, fince we are now fure of the matter of fact, we are certainly better judges of that point than they, and it is but juft, that we should speak of things as the light of hiftory directs us *.

The conftable, perceiving that not only the dauphin Paris furbut the people were difpleafed, judged it neceffary, to- prifed by wards keeping up their fpirits, to fend out a part of his the duke of Burgundy's forces to recover Montlheri and Marcoufli, a fervice which troops. they performed; but neverthelefs this fuccefs proved his and the destruction. There was one Perrinet le Clerc, the fon conflable of an ironmonger, who had been ill-treated by the do- murdered meftics of one of the king's counfellors, of which he had complained, without being able to obtain redrefs : his fa-

The Burgundians were quickly joined by feveral thousands of low people, who furprifed the chancellor, feveral prelates, and at length the conftable, who was difcovered by a mafon, to whofe houfe A D.1418. he fled for fhelter; and thefe, together with two archbishops, they conducted to prifon. But a few days after, that they might have an opportunity to plunder, they took arms again, forced the prifon-doors, and murdered the greatest part of them, by throwing them from the top of the edifice, upon their companions pikes, and afterwards dragged the bodies of the conftable and the chancellor de Marle about the ftreets z. The duke of Burgundy returned foon after with the queen, and the king, either through weaknefs or fear, received them very kindly. It was not long before the duke found himfelf under great difficulties from the very fpirit which, in fo unlooked-for a manner, put him in possession of the capital, the people affuming a liberty of doing what they pleafed, which at first he durst not oppose. This was carried to fo great a height, that the common hangman walked about the city in his robes; and, when they had a mind to plunder any rich family, those about him cried they were Armagnacs; upon which he difpatched the mafter of the houfe, and perhaps his fons, and the people took all they had. This executioner had the folly to go to the duke of Burgundy's palace, and the impudence to fhake him by the hand; but the duke, fending the beft part of the city troops to recover the towns the conftable had taken, laid hold of this opportunity to hang the hangman; and, by bringing in a body of his own troops, kept the people in better order <sup>a</sup>. He would have treated with the dauphin, whom his mother earneftly invited back to Paris; but that prince was either not inclined, or was perfuaded by those about him not to truft her. He fixed himfelf therefore at Poictiers, where he affembled the remains of the parliament of Paris, appointed a new chancellor, befieged and took Tours, with many other places.

While thefe ftrange adventures happened in France, The queen king Henry reduced the greatest part of Normandy, but and the offered at the fame time to treat with the dauphin and duke of with the duke of Burgundy, though both these treaties treat with were mere amufements; the king telling the pope's le- Henry gate, that he might fee the finger of God in the chaftife- about a ment of France; and that having himfelf a good title to marriage the crown, Providence feemed to have opened him a fair and a path to the poffession of it b In all thefe treaties, there-peace. fore, there was nothing of fincerity on any fide; the dauphin and the duke of Burgundy vainly deluded themfelves with the hopes of gaining Henry as an ally; whereas the king of England meant to clofe with neither, but, by treating with both at a time, to thruft himfelf like a wedge between them, and thereby hinder their coalition, which was the fingle event he had to fear. It may fuffice, therefore, to fay, that, though on the part of the duke of Burgundy the treaty was managed by the queen in perfon, who carried with her the princefs Catherine, to whofe beauty the king was far from being infenfible, yet he was fo much a hero and a politician, that, in fpite of his paffion, his interest prevailed; to that, notwithstanding many propositions were made, they feparated without coming to any conclusion c. Henry, during the time of this treaty, remained at Mante, and the French court at Pontoife, the conferences being held in a place at a convenient diftance between these two towns, and terminated in the beginning of the month of May, very little to the fatisfaction of the duke of Burgundy, who faw plainly, that he began to lofe his intereft with the French, and that at the fame time he was lefs confidered by the Englifh. A circumftance that led him to repent the contributing as he had done to their invalion and fuccefs d.

The dauphin, alarmed at his mother's treaty with the In this conking of England, and knowing to how great a degree he fusion the was hated by her, refolved, if possible, to accommodate dauphin matters with the duke of Burgundy, as the most effectual a treaty means to repel the English, or at least to procure fome- with the what milder terms. out of bed in his thirt) had preferred him the night that Paris was furprifed, to Pontoife, to propole an interview with the duke, which was brought about through the perfuafion of madam Giac, of whom the duke was paffionately fond . This interview was held the 11th of July, at Souilli le Fort, a league from Melun, with great marks of efteem and tenderne's on both fides, and with the most profound fubmiffion on the part of the duke of Burgundy. They fwore perpetual free hip and unity on a crofs, prefented by the bifhop of Laon; and, at parting, agreed on another conference at Montereau Faut Yvonne f. Henry was quickly apprifed of this accommodation, and that both parties had agreed to carry on the war against him with vigour, which feemed to be a most perfidious act in the duke of Burgundy, confidering the terms on which he flood with that monarch; yet, in reality, the king of England had no great reafon to complain, fince in treating with the dauphin he had offered to join with him in the conquest of Flanders, provided he might retain the fovereignty after it was reduced ; with which propolition the dauphin acquainted him in their interviews. By way of revenge, the king fent a ftrong detachment of his forces to furprife Pontoife, where the marshal Lisle Adam commanded, who made his escape, with forme difficulty, in his thirt, together with fix thoufand men, the greatest part of them in the fame condition. The news of this hoftility greatly qualified the joy which the people of Paris had expressed upon proclaiming the peace, and with good reafon, for the English took all the treafure, equipage, and baggage, of the court in that place, to the value, as it was computed, of two millions h. In Lower Normandy the forces of the dauphin recovered feveral places; and in a brifk action at Mortain were victorious, and killed the English about four hundred men, the duke of Burgundy remaining all this time in a ftate of confusion and inactivity, as if he knew not which fide to take.

ference was upon a bridge, with ten perfons of confidence on a fide. The duke, on the approach of the dauphin. bent his knee, and in that action threw his fword too far behind him; he therefore laid his hand on it to pull it right, on which Tannegui du Chaftel, who had been a domeftic to the duke of Orleans, cried with a ftern voice, " It is time," and immediately, with his pole ax, cut off the duke's chin as he was kneeling, and, before he was able to rife, or put himfelf in a posture of defence, he was difpatched by feveral mortal wounds. Noailles, who was the nearest him of any of his own party, drawing his dagger, was killed upon the fpot ; eight more of his friends were fecured, and only Montague, by leaping the barriers, which was thought imposible, made his efcape : this tragedy was acted on the 10th of September k. Most writers fay it was in the dauphin's prefence; others allege that two of his own people withdrew him before the duke was killed; certain it is, that he difavowed it by a manifefto, and as certain that this difavowal was generally believed. At Paris they expressed the utmost horror and indignation; and the queen's chancellor, for there were now double officers of every denomination, prevailed to have the first prefident fent to the new duke, to condole, in the name of the king, the qucen, and the city of Paris on the lofs of his father 1. On the 17th of October a treaty of union was figned, by deputies from feveral cities, at Arras, for revenging his death; and on the 2d of De- A D. 1419. cember a truce, between the kings of France and England, under the mediation of the duke of Burgundy, that all parties might act with the greater vigour against the common enemy, that is, against the dauphin m.

After the ratification by Charles, his queen, the duke of Burgundy, and a multitude of great lords, who fwore fealty to Henry and his heirs, he was contracted to the prince's Catharine, whom he efpoufed on the 2d of June; and then the treaty being approved by the parliament, was proclaimed in moft of the great towns, and the dauphin declared an enemy to the flate, and incepable of the fucceffion <sup>n</sup>.

Henry taket every m thod to fecure the pol fion and the fuccefion, while the amphin tabours to windicate his right to the regency, and to the erown.

Henry, king of England and heir of France, judging rightly that, as his title was acquired, fo it muft be fupported by force, inftead of wafting his time in celebrating his marriage with justs and tournaments, to which the French lords were inclined, marched the very next day to reduce Sens, which fubmitted without any reliftance. The king, having made his entry, turned to the archbishop, whom the dauphin, for his attachment to the duke of Burgundy, had expelled, and who performed the ceremony of the king's marriage, and made him the following compliment: " We are now even, my friend; yesterday you gave me a wife, and to day I reftore your's 9." He proceeded to Montereau, which was reduced with like facility; when the duke of Burgundy finding his father's corpfe interred in his cloaths, caufed it to be put in a leaden coffin, embalmed, and fent to Dijon : the army next befieged Melun, which was defended with great fpirit and bravery for four months, and then furrendered by capitulation, which the French writers fay was not exactly kept ". The feafon being pretty far advanced, the two kings returned to Paris; where, notwithstanding they were in a very miferable and flarving condition, the inhabitants were forced to exhauft themfelves in rejoicings upon this occafion. A few days after, the duke of Burgundy demanded justice of the king, for the murder of his father. In an affembly held in the prefence of both kings, the dauphin being fummoned to appear, and juftify himfelf against the charge brought by two proctors, in the name of the duke of Burgundy, he was condemned for contumacy, as failing to appear, declared convict of murder, banifhed France for ever, and adjudged unworthy and incapable of the crown ; which fentence was pronounced by John le Clerc, who had then the office, or at leaft the title of chancellor of France<sup>s</sup>. In the month of December was held an affembly of the flates, in which a fubfidy was demanded of an eight part of the money every man poffeffed, to which the deputies confented, and it was raifed by paying heavy money at the exchequer, and receiving light in the proportion before mentioned t. We must now pafs to the other court : the dauphin, now in the feventeenth year of his age, affumed the fame title with Henry, ftyling himfelf regent and heir of France. All the provinces beyond the Lorre declared for him without fcruple; most of the princes of the blood, and many of the nobility, chofe to follow his fortunes. The prince of Orange, as a partizan of the houfe of Burgundy, was the only enemy he had in the fouth of France; but, by giving the government of. Languedoc to the count of Foix, he made his efforts in that caufe ineffectual". The count of Foix affecting to A D. 1420. render himfelf independent, and having with this view demanded a patent for the fame government from the king, the dauphin found it neceffary to deprive him, though of his own naming, which he did, and replaced him by the count de Clermont, eldest fon of the duke of Bourbon ". He likewife found means to get more money than the two kings, by their edict for debaling the coin; for he railing the nominal value much higher than they, as foon as their new coin appeared, drew the best part of it into the cities under his obedience, which enabled him to pay his troops; while at Paris, the winter being remarkably hard, the people perifhed by hundreds in the ftreets with cold and hunger.

The affairs of his hereditary dominions obliged Henry to Queen Kamake a tour to England, whither he likewife carried his therine goes new queen, leaving the duke of Exeter to command in Paris, and to take charge of the court of France. were committed to his brother the duke of Clarence. The duke of Burgundy, at the fame time, returned likewife into his territories; and the truth was, they both flood in great need of forces, those they had brought from England and Burgundy being worn out, either by fickness or fervice, and they were afraid of trufting to an army composed for the most part of French troops *. Henry was likewife defirous of feeing his queen crowned in England, of obtaining the fanction of parliament to his treaty of Troye, which he confidered as the conftitution of his new monarchy, and a large fupply of money, that he might be-able to complete the conqueft of France. He fucceeded in most of these points; but had the misfortune to be told by his parliament, that England, exclusive of fame. was fo far from being a gainer by his conquest, that the acquifition of France was like to become her ruin, a declaration which chagrined him exceedingly; for he fincerely loved his country, and faw he had impoverished it with regret. He loved his family likewife, with a tendernefs not altogether governed by prudence : a ftrong inftance of this affection appeared in permitting his brother the duke of Gloucester to steal Jaqueline, duchefs of Brabant, from her hufband, on account of the great dominions which the poffeffed in her own right; for this exploit gave a great difguft to the duke of Burgundy, as well on the fcore of the outrage done to his coufin, as becaufe the establishment of this young prince in the Low Countries would have been very unacceptable to himfelf, as the king might eafily have forefeen y.

The Scots forces, under the command of the earl of Buchan, defeats the duke of Ciarence, at Vauge. Things in the mean time took a new turn in France. The dauphin having received a fupply of fix or feven thoufand Scots, under the command of the regent's fon John Stuart, earl of Buchan, he fent them to defend his frontier on the fide of Anjou, and appointed the Sicur de la Fayette, with a corps of French forces, to affift them. Thefe Scots being quartered at Bauge by themfelves, the duke of Clarence had intelligence of them; and making no doubt that he fhould be able to furprife them, marched with fifteen hundred men at arms, and the beft archers he had, with that view, leaving orders for the earl of Salifbury to follow him as foon as he conveniently could, with the reft of his forces. The earl of Buchan, having polled his troops advantageoufly, received him gallantly. The duke exposed himself in fuch a manner, that, after performing all that could be expected from his birth and courage, he was flain upon the fpot, and his troops were defeated : there fell likewife the earl of Kent, lord Grey, the lord Rofs, and about three thousand men; the earls of Somerfet and Huntingdon, with fome other perions of note, were taken prifoners. This victory, though it coft the lives of fifteen hundred French, was, as their writers very juftly obferve, of great confequence, fince it proved that the English were not invincible ". The French army next befieged Alencon; the earl of Salifbury marched that way to raile the fiege; but finding the enemy too ftrong, he retired, and his rear fuffered in his retreat. Henry landed at Calais with twenty-eight thousand men, of . which four thousand were horse: he marched directly to the relief of Chartres, which was befieged by the dauphin, who retired at his approach, and he followed him as far as Orleans 2. On his return, at the requeft of the people of Paris, he befieged Meaux, which held out for eight months, and, when it furrendered, the king caufed the governor to be beheaded. This, and fome other inftances of mour. chagrined the French exceedingly : but, neverthelefs, they thought it prudent to make great rejoicings on the news of queen Catherine's being delivered of a fon at Windfor, A.D. 1421. who was confidered as the fucceffor of both kingdoms b. As for the unfortunate Charles, he would have been more pitied if he had fhewn any fenfe of his misfortunes; but he feemed to be altogether without feeling; and as for the queen, her implacable averfion to the dauphin, her particular kindnefs for the princefs Catherine, who very much refembled her, and the refpect paid her by her fonin-law, who was the first prince in Europe, kept her from feeing the real mifery of her condition; fo that, upon all occasions, the appeared with a freedom and fpirit, which, at the fame time that it raifed the odium of the French. made her contemptible to the English .

with him the poor infirm king and the two queens. He flaid fome time at Senlis, while the carl of Warwick cleared the adjacent country; but was fuddenly recalled to Paris, by intelligence that the dauphin had friends there, who meant to put him in possession of the place. On his arrival he found a woman, who had been apprehended with letters to fuch as were privy to this defign; and, as the acknowleged her fault, he directed that her accomplices, being fecured, they fhould be all thrown together into the river. After this detection and difappointment of his enemies, he returned again to Senlis. The dauphin, in the mean time, invefted Cone upon the Loire, with twenty thousand men, and obliged the governor to confent that he would render the place into his hands, if it was not relieved by the duke of Burgundy by the middle of August. The duke, piqued at this event, challenged the dauphin to name a day of battle; which being accepted, Henry refolved to be prefent, and with that view ordered his forces to march from Paris and Picardy through Champagne, to join those of the duke of Burgundy ; but finding himfelf very much indifpoled at Melun, he directed his brother, the duke of Bedford, and the earl of Warwick, to join the duke of Burgundy as foon as poffible, and retired himfelf into Vincennes. There his diftemper increafed to fuch a degree as left little hopes of recovery: this diftemper was a fiftula, the nature of which being then little underftood, was fo ill managed, that a mortification enfued. In his laft moments he recommended to the lords that were about him three things; the first was to preferve, by all means poffible, the friendship of the duke of Burgundy, and to give him, in cafe they could engage him to accept it, the regency of France, which, if he refused, he confided to the duke of Bedford. In the next place, he forbid them to fet at liberty the French prifoners. till his fon fhould be of full age; and, laftly, he commanded them, in cafe they fhould ever be forced to make a peace with Charles de Valois (fo he called the dauphin) to fecure the duchy of Normandy, and annex it, as an independent fovereignty, to England d. He declared Humphry, duke of Gloucester, regent of England, and appointed the earl of Warwick governor of his fon's perfon. This disposition being made, he prepared for death, with great calmnefs and conflancy, ending his days on the laft of August, in the thirty-fixth year of his age<sup>e</sup>. The duke of Burgundy having refused the regency, the duke of Bedford aflumed it, but governed entirely by his and the queen's advice. (H) We have already defcribed the perfon of this monarch, and obferved that he was one of the handfomeit men of his age. At the age of feventeen, his ftrength was fo great, that he was able to break a horfe-fhoe : he wreftled, vaulted, ran at the ring, and performed every fort of manly exercife with great desterity. His natural good qualities gained him the affection, and, in fome degree, the efteem of his fubjects. He caufed the body of the constable du Guesclin to be buried with great fplendour, at St. Denis: neither was he grateful only to the dead but to the living, infomuch that he never forgot any perfonal fervices that were rendered him, but rewarded them amply, fome fay profufely. He was prodigioufly given to fliews and fpectacles, and was never better pleafed than when he could find an opportunity to exhibit them. It is hard to fay whether the king's ficknefs or long life, his own weaknefs, or his wife's gallantries, the want of experience in his fons, or the boundless ambition of his uncles, were most prejudicial to his realm ; but the conjunction of them all, and the lofs of the battle of Agincourt, brought it fo low, that it is not impossible Henry V. if he had lived, might have eftablifhed a new line. By his queen Ifabel of Bavaria, whom the French represent as equally vicious and cunning, the king had many children ; viz. two princes of the name of Charles, who died young ; Lewis, duke of Guienne, and, by their death, dauphin, who married Margaret, daughter to the duis of Burgundy, and died at the age of nineteen without iffue: John, duke of Touraine and Dauphiné, who espoufed Jaqueline, daughter to the count of Hainault, who also died without iffue, about the fame age with his brother; Charles, who fucceeded his father ; and Philip, who died the fame day be was born, and was the child of whom the queen lay-in when the duke of Orleans was murdered; the princefs Joan died at two years old; Ifabel efpoufed first Richard II. king of England, and then Charles. duke of Orleans; another Joan. the confort of John, duke of Bretagne; Mary, who became a nun; Michella, married to Philip the Good, duke of Burgundy; and Catharine, their voungelt age, the forty-third of his reign, and the thirtieth from the lofs of his fenfes: he was little deplored by his fubjects, ftill lefs by the English, and there was not fo much as a fingle prince of the blood to attend his funeral <sup>f</sup>.

Charles VII. or the Victorious.

The flate of France under her two kings, Henry and Charles, who are both proclaimed.

AT this time the whole French nation had the heavy misfortune of being confidered as rebels and traitors, whatever fide they took. At the interment of Charles VI. Henry of Windfor was proclaimed king of France and England, being then about ten months old; but the fword of flate was carried before the duke of Bedford. who, with the title of regent, had all the power of king s. The dauphin Charles was in the twentieth year of his age, a mild prince, of a very gentle and affable difpolition, by which he became very acceptable to all who approached him. We meet with very different characters of him in hiftory; but, if we advert to facts only, we fhall find that he very much refembled his grandfather ; and that those who fay his good fortune, in having able ministers and great captains in his fervice, flood him inflead of courage and conduct, do him great wrong; for, if he had not been both a wife and a fleady prince, he would never have raifed France from the wretched condition in which he found her h. About ten days before his father's death, he was preferved, by what was then efteemed a miraculous interpolition of Providence, from a fudden and miferable death. The room, in which he was giving audience at Rochelle, fell all at once, by which many were wounded, and fome killed on the fpot i. The dauphin, finking in his chair, fell upon a thick wall, and there refted, from whence he was taken down without the leaft hurt. At the time of his acceffion he was at a little caffle, where

To remove the former, and to prevent the latter, he refolved to unite, if possible, the dukes of Burgundy and Bretagne infeparably to his interefts 1. The former had two fifters, Mary, the widow of the late dauphin Lewis, and Anne, who had never been married. He demanded the latter for himfelf, and procured the former to be given to Arthur, earl of Richmond, brother to the duke of Bretagne, who had been taken prifoner at the battle of Agincourt, and whom, by this ftep, he thought fufficiently attached to the English interest. The battle of Crevant, in Burgundy, was A D. 1423. another fortunate event to him, and a terrible blow to --Charles. The earls of Salifbury and Suffolk defeated there the earl of Buchan, with the beft corps of troops that Charles had in his fervice, made that earl prifoner, and killed a great many brave officers who were under his command m.

He was himfelf very young, and void of all education; and yet he was fo far from defpairing, that he invited other men to fhare in his hopes". The earl of Buchan had been styled constable of the Scots. moft of whom were flain in fucceflive actions; the king, to confole him, and to draw greater fuccours from the fame country, gave him the fword, and created him constable of France; he bestowed likewife the lordship of Aubigny upon Sir John Stuart of Darnley, on whom he afterwards conferred the county of Evreux. This generofity had a good effect; the duke of Albany concluded an alliance with him on the terms which he propofed, and fent over the lord Douglas with fix thousand men, to whom Charles gave the duchy of Touraine, and declared him lieutenant-general . The duke of Milan fent him fix hundred horfe, and a thoufand crofs-bows; many of his own fubjects raifed confiderable corps at their own expence; by this means he brought a confiderable army into the field, and left the operations to the diferetion of his generals. One of his captains had furprifed Yuri, which, being a place of great confequence, the English had invested; the constable marched to his relief with fourteen thousand men, of whom one half were of his own country; but the place furrendered before their arrival. The conftable turned fhort upon Vernueil, which was a place of as great confequence; and, pretending that he had raifed the fiege of Yuri, engaged the garrifon to furrender.

His troops battle of Vernuel, in which the constable and the earl of Douglas are killed.

This event fo much provoked the regent duke of Bedbeat at the ford, that he marched in perfon, attended by the earls of Salifbury and Suffolk, with a superior army to recover it. Several of the French generals were for leaving a ftrong garrifon in the place, and declining a battle, which they had formerly found the beft method of proceeding. But the conftable and the other generals of his country were of a contrary opinion; and, notwithstanding the French lords urged that their king had no army but this, which if beaten, he had no refource, yet they perfifted in their refolution of fighting, afferting, that a battle gained would change the face of affairs, give a reputation to the king's arms, and very probably excite infurrections in his favour in most of the provinces in the kingdom : the duke of Alencon, and one or two other great lords, being of the fame mind, it was determined to fight. On the 16th of August, the duke of Bedford appeared with his army drawn up in one line, the conftable made the like difpofition with great skill, intending to have remained firm, and to have received the charge; but the vifcount of Narbonne, full of impatience, marched directly to attack the English with his own cavalry, and was followed by other French lords, a rafh ftep which obliged the confiable to follow them, and to lofe the advantage of his poft and of his difpolition. The duke of Bedford, on the contrary, halted, as foon as they began to move; fo that they were fatigued and out of breath when they began to attack; and, being vigoroufly repulfed, and their general killed, were quickly broke. Neverthelefs, the Italian horfe broke through the archers, and fell upon the English camp, which they were tempted to plunder. Thus the main body was left open on all fides; and, after a difpute of an hour, it was broke, and the French were totally defeated. There fell in this fatal field, the conftable, the earl of Douglas, his fon, the counts of Aumale, Ventadour, and Tonnerc, with upwards of one hundred other lords, befides the vifcount of Narbonne, whofe body the duke of Bedford caufed to be broke on a wheel, and then exposed on a gibbet, because he was one of the ten prefent at the death of the duke of Burgundy P. Five thousand private men were killed in the battle and in the flight; the duke of Alencon, his baftard brother, and the marfhal de l'Effiat, were made prifoners. The lofs on the other fide was fo confiderable, that the duke of Bedford forbid any rejoicings for a victory that had coft him fo dear; and granted an honourable capitulation to the garrifon of Vernueil, as being very well pleafed to recover the place without the fatigue of a fiege 9.

The affairs of Charles were now in a wretches fitua-This retion. He received them with open arms; he carefied and commended them; and declared upon all occasions, his inclination to reward as foon as it should be in his power: to fay all, in a few words, his condition was now fo funk, that his affability was his fole prerogative; and the reputation he had established of gratitude, the only remnant of revenue. The duke of Bedford might have marched to the Loire the next fpring, and have buried the ruins of the French monarchy, with its monarch, in the fucceeding fummer; but, as if he had been ashamed of opprefling fo feeble an enemy, he indulged them as long a time to breathe in as they could defire '. 'Yet the duke of Bedford was as vigilant as he was brave; and this inactivity, which faved the French, proceeded from his misfortune, not his fault. The prodigious fuccels of the Englift, and the glory attending it, had corrupted even the greatest minds. Humphry duke of Gloucester, regent of England, and the duke of Bedford's brother, not fatisfied with the poffeffion of Jaqueline, countefs of Hainault, whom he had taken from her hufband the duke of Brabant, would likewife tear from him the countries which he held in her right; and, with this view, had landed a numerous English army, more than fufficient to have completed the conquest of France; where they would have eafily crushed the duke of Brabant, if his cousin, the duke of Burgundy, had not ftepped in to his relief'. This was A.D.1414. that unexpected diversion which faved Charles from de-· ftruction, by obliging the regent duke of Bedford to turn all his views on this fide; and to employ those great parts and that perfualive eloquence with which he was bleffed, to reconcile his brother and his brother-in-law, and to prevent the empire, which the victorious Henry had raifed, from mouldering into ruins before it was well established. In this neceffary defign he met with fo many obffacles, that, notwithstanding the apparent danger of his leaving France, he was conftrained to make a tour to England, where the management of feveral important affairs detained him for fome months, to the great prejudice of his

He reconciled underflood that Arthur, earl of Richmond, notwithftand- to king ing his close alliance with the duke of Bedford, had con- Charles. ceived offence from being refufed the command of the English army, which he thought due to his high rank, and very fuitable to his being an English peer. The minifters of Charles, knowing he had been bred up at the French court, and had behaved very gallantly at Agincourt, thought it not imposible to recover him; and, by his means, the duke of Bretagne, his brother. With this view a negotiation was fet on foot, which, though put into the hands of a very able man, mifcarried : this was the prefident Louvet, the companion of the king's misfortunes, and the director of his finances; but he had the misfortune to be odious to the house of Bretagne, and, confequently, nothing that came from him was regarded. The king therefore, had recourse to his mother-in-law, the queen-dowager of Naples, who, taking with her his prime minister Tannegui du Chastel, went to the court of Bretagne, and by dextroufly playing the conftable's fword in the eyes of the earl of Richmond, who was eager to be at the head of an army, carried her point, though on pretty hard conditions, fince the king was forced to give hoftages, and even cautionary places, for the fecurity of the earl's perfon, who farther declared he could not enter into his fervice, but with the confent of the duke of Burgundy ". This condition was alfo admitted, in hopes that it might prove the means of entering into a negociation with the duke of Burgundy, and it had this effect; for the duke confented to the earl of Richmond's promotion; and, having lately married the lady Bona of Artois, fifter to the count of Eu, flewed fome inclination to reconcile himfelf to the king; but, how acceptable foever thefe tranfactions might be in one light, they caufed no fmall chagrin, when viewed in another; for the duke of Bretagne infifted on the removal of the prefident Louvet, and two or three other perfons who had been always about the king; and the duke of Burgundy would hear of nothing while the king had for his first minister the man who had A.D. 1425. the chief hand in murdering his father *. This was Tannegui du Chastel, a person, in all other points, irreproachable, and who acted in that affair from his zeal for the memory of the duke of Orleans, in whofe fervice he had been brought up from his youth. His behaviour at this critical juncture gained him credit, even with his enemies; for he went to the king, and, after a modest recapitulation of his fervices, declared, the only reward he fought was his leave to retire y. The prefident Louvet and the reft were alfo forced to give way; but they did it with a bad grace, and the prefident infifted upon naming the Sieur Giac his fucceffor. Thefe precautions taken, Arthur, earl of Richmond, received the fword of constable. He foon after took the field, and recovered feveral places from the English upon the frontiers of Normandy.

The earl of The earl of Warwick, who commanded for king Henry Richmond, in Normandy, being informed that the duke of Bretagne conflable of had done homage for his duchy and county of Montford to king Charles, made himfelf master of Pontorson, and of St. James de Beuvron, which being conveniently fituated, he made continual inroads from thence to the very gates of Rennes. 'The new conftable of France marched speedily to the relief of his brother, recovered Pontorfor, and blocked up Beuvron; but was obliged to raife the fiege for want of fupplies z. In the first transport of his paffion he feized the chancellor of Bretagne, and carried him to Chinon, where the king then was, who pacified him with fome difficulty; and, having got the chancellor out of his hands, fent him with a commission to the court of Burgundy. The conflable then fell upon Giac, and finding him involved in a quarrel with another of the king's favourites, whofe name was Trimouille, he took him into his councils. With his affiftance, he forced the caffle in which Giac lay, and taking him out of bed, carried him to a place entirely in his own power; there, with an odd and irregular form of juffice, he caufed him to be condemned for embezzling the king's money; and without farther ceremony threw him into the river *. The violence of the constable was lefs condemned than the wickednefs of Trimouille, who had an intrigue with Giac's wife (the fame perfon who was the duke of Burgundy's mittrefs), and married her. Soon after the king replaced his unfortunate minifter by a gentleman of Auvergne, whofe name was Camus de Beaulieu. This perfon had likewife the misfortune not to pleafe the conftable, who ordered him to be flabbed near Poictiers; then going to court, instead of excusing it, he told the king that he was but an ill judge of miniflers, and for the future he would chufe for him. Charles, who without being either a coward or a fool, could fubmit to necessity with a better grace than ever prince did, defired to know who was to be his minister, the constable answered Trimouille; " It fhall be fo, replied the king; but I know him better than you, and that he will give you caufe to repent it b. Montarges was at this time belieged by the English; and, being a place of confequence, the king was very defirous to relieve it : an army was affembled to efcort a great convoy of provisions, and the conftable would have charged himfelf with the enterprize; but, being told it was beneath his dignity, the command was given to the baftard of Orleans; who not only performed what was expected from him, but was fo fortunate as to oblige the earl of Warwick to raife the fiege. But, while his arms were A.D.1417. fuccefsful on this fide, the regent duke of Bedford, who . had reconciled himfelf to the duke of Burgundy, invaded Bretagne with a great army, compelled the duke to fubfcribe the treaty of Troye, and to give him all pollible affurances of remaining an obedient fubject to his nephew king Henry, Trimouille, to make his court to his mafter, advifed him to lay hold of this opportunity to humble the conftable; but, as this minister had rendered himfelf odious to feveral of the princes of the blood, they took part with the earl of Richmond, and this animofity produced a kind of civil war; in which, however, the king had the better . In this fituation the people deplored alike their domeftic troubles and apprehensions from the English.

artillery and fmall arms, beyond any thing that had been feen in former wars d. But the regent duke of Bedford, having once more fixed the dukes of Burgundy and Bretagne, recurred to his former plan, and refolved to make the entire conquest of France. He was already in poffeffion of a place upon the Loire, which enabled him to pafs that river at his pleafure; but it was at too great a diftance ; and he was apprehensive, that if he had attacked Charles with his whole forces in this manner, that prince might pafs the river in another place, and march to Paris . After mature deliberation, he appointed Thomas Montague, earl of Salifbury, to command a body of ten thoufand veteran troops, and gave him inftructions to befiege Orleans, a place of great extent, and, for those times, well fortified. Salifbury executed this command with equal vigour and capacity; he fpent the fummer in reducing all the fortified pofts in the neighbourhood of that city; and formed the fiege at the beginning of autumn. On the other hand, Charles, confidering the lofs of Orleans as the prelude to the lofs of his dominions, took all the precautions pollible for its defence. Very confiderable magazines were raifed, and a great quantity of military A.D.1428. flores lodged in the place. The lord de Gaucour, a perfon of great experience and reputation, was the governor, and he was affifted by the Sieur la Hire Saintrailles ; in a word, most of the brave men who had raifed themselves to rank and fame, threw themfelves into this city, in order to defend it as long as it was possible; the fiege lafted all the winter, and the earl of Salifbury had the mifortune to be killed by a cannon fnot; but the earl of Suffolk, on whom the command devolved, continued it with equal vigour and vigilance; and, by receiving continual fupplies, his army was increased to twenty-three thousand men f. The method of invefting was at this time very rude; for we find that they had fix great, and fifty-four finall foris round the place; but as there were open fpaces between them, the baftard of Orleans and other gallant officers found means to introduce fuccours; and the garrifon from twelve hundred, was, by the end of the year, fwelled to three thousand men "; amongst whom were the flower of the French nobility.

This was flyled the battle of Herrings. and makes a great figure in the hiftory of those times 1. The baftard of Orleans, who with four hundred men had marched from Orleans to fupport this attack, had the good fortune to return, and to get fafe into the city, which, notwithstanding, was f on reduced fo very low, and there was to little appearance of any relief, that the garrifon at length offered to furrender to the duke of Burgundy, an offer which the English generals rejected; and this refufal, in all probability, preferved both the city and the crown to Charles, who, upon its furrender, muft have retired into the mountains of Dauphiné, as having no force fufficient to keep the field. But while things were in this flate, a miracle, as the French would have us believe, a fingular and lucky ftratagem, as the penetration of later times have taught us to call it, faved Orleans, and delivered Charles from the neceffity of feeking thelter in inacceffible places from the purfuit of his victorious enemics.

A little before the battle of Herrings, a young woman, The Maid whofe name was Joan d'Arc, a native of the village of of Orleans Domremi, near Vaucouleurs, came to the governor of the first relaft mentioned place, and demanded that he fhould fend then raifes her to the king, as having been promifed by a divine reve- the fiege of lation, that, under her command, the king's forces thould that city. raife the fiege of Orleans. Upon this declaration, the governor ordered two gentlemen to attend her to Chinon, where the king was; and, though there could not be a more dangerous journey, vet, as the had confidently promifed, they performed it fafely 1. Upon her arrival, the council made fome difficulty of admitting her to the royal prefence; but at length fhe gained admittance. The king was in his apartment, furrounded by many perfons of diffinction, without any marks of his high rank, to whom the immediately addreffed herfelf, and told him that the had a commission from Heaven to deliver his city of Orleans, and to conduct him afterwards to Rheims, in order to celebrate his coronation<sup>m</sup>. The king either was, or affected to be in great doubt, demanded fome evident incontestible marks of her mission. caufed her to be examined by a committee of divines, and fent her afterwards to Poictiers to confer with the parliament. Having had the advice of both, he ordered a body of ten or twelve thousand men to affemble, in order to ferve as an efcort to a great convoy, which the undertook to conduct fafely into the city. This fervice the performed, fhut herfelf up afterwards in the place, with the affistance of the bastard of Orleans harrafied the beliegers fo much, that at length they were constrained to retire, after having lain before, and in the neighbourhood of the city, upwards of a year. From this exploit the was flyled La Pucelle d'Orleans, or the Maid of Orleans : fhe wore the drefs of a man; appeared on horfeback like a young cavalier; charged at the head of the troops with great courage; affected an extraordinary piety; and was irreproachable in point of merals.

In fine, Rheims opened her gates; the king was folemnly crowned on the 17th of July; pushed his conquests as far as the Seine, and even made an attempt upon Paris, where the Pucelle expoled herfelf extremely, but at length was obliged to defift. In the mean time a new negociation was fet on foot with the duke of Burgundy, which, however, was baffled by the industry and address of the duke of Bedford, who, notwithflanding, declined fighting the French army; and, it is remarkable, that the forces of the kingdom were now fo much reduced, that the troops on both fides, at the clofe of this campaign, did not exceed twenty-five thoufand men. The Pucelle demanded the king's leave to retire, A.D. 1429. as having completed her miffion; but her prefence was thought fo neceffary, that the king conftrained her to remain. As a mark of his favour and gratitude for paft fervices, he ennobled her family; beftowed on them the name of Du Lif, and all their defcendents males and females; the latter part, however, of this grant has been fince abolifhed.

However, Ralph, lord of Gaucour, governor for the king, having very early intelligence of this confederacy, attacked and defeated the prince of Orange. who narrowly escaped with his life, and afterwards reconciled himfelf to the king, and entered into his fervice. But the most important event of this year was the fiege of Compeigne, which the duke of Burgundy invefted with a numerous army. The place was gallantly defended by the Sieur de Flavy, and the Pucelle throwing herfelf into it with an additional force, made a fally on the 26th of May, in which the had the misfortune to be taken prifoner by a A.D.1410. gentleman of Burgundy, who fold her to the English. Notwithstanding this misfortune, Compeigne was fo well defended, that the count de Vendolme, having affembled a competent number of troops, forced the beliegers in their camp, and obliged them to retire in fuch hafte, that they left their artillery and baggage, an advantage which fo raifed the fpirits of his forces, that he offered the duke of Burgundy battle, which that prince thought it prudent to decline.

The war was carried on with as much vigour on both Kousen and fides as the fhattered flate of their finances and the exhaufted condition of the provinces would allow; fo that every day produced either the furprifal of towns, excursions for plunder, or difputes in the field; which, however, determined nothing 5. The difputed fuccefiion of the duchy of Lorrain augmented the differences between king Charles and the duke of Burgundy, the former took part with Rene d'Anjou, brother to Lewis, king of Sicily, who had married Habella, the daughter of the laft duke Charles; and the duke efpoufed that of the count De Vaudemont, brother to the deceased duke of Lorrain. This affair was for the prefent decided by a battle, in which Rene was made prifoner t. The regent duke of Bedford, who had caufed the young king his nephew to pafs the fea to Calais, from whence he came to Rouen, made use of his prefence there to countenance the profecution of the Pu-

A few days after, her dreffing again in man's apparel was adjudged contumacy. She was condemned, by the bifhop of Beauvais and the inquifitors. who were her judges, to the flames; and, being delivered to the fecular power, was accordingly burnt in the marketplace of Rouen ". She fuffered with courage, and afferted the was no impostor. Her memory was justified twentyfour years after, when the crown of France was the ftrongeft, by the papal authority; but the difpute is not yet fettled amongst the learned, whether she was a faint, a witch, or, what the moderns call, a girl of fpirit. On the 2d of A D.1431. December, Henry made his entrance into Paris, by the . gate of St. Denis, was received with all apparent marks of duty and fubmiffion, and of joy likewife; he paid his refpects to his grandmother the queen-dowager, and on the 17th was crowned in the cathedral of Notre Dame, by his uncle, the cardinal bifhop of Winchefter, a circumftance which difobliged the bithop of Paris extremely "; there were only two fpiritual and none of the temporal peers prefent. On the 21ft he held his bed of juffice in open parliament, and received the homage of all the members. Before the close of the year he returned again to Rouen.

The reason for which the duke of Bedford fent him thi- The confiather, was, that his perfon might be fecure, the troops of bie feizesla king Charles frequently making incursions as far as the Seine, and there being flill fome fufpicions as to the fidelity of the people of Paris. Yet this flep, equally prudent nifter. and well executed, was very near producing a bad effect. A French gentleman furprifed the caitle, with one hundred and twenty men ; and the city would have been taken if the troops employed for that purpole had not quarrelled about the division of the booty; a dispute which gave the English and the townsmen an opportunity of recovering the caffle, and of executing the belt part of the garrifon.

who had furrendered at differention x.' The baftard of Orleans, now styled count of Dunois, had been more fortunate in furprifing Chartres; and the English, in their turn, made themfelves mafters of Montarges, which the French attempted to recover, but failed, through the negligence of La Trimouille, the king's first minister, who becoming very odious, the conftable refolved to treat him as he had treated his predeceffors. Having concerted meafures with fome of the principal perfons about the court, who abhorred him for his pride, they feized him in the caftle of Chinon, in the very next room to the king; and, after a struggle, in which the minister was wounded, carried him away prifoner, and thut him up in the caftle of Montrefor, where he remained long confined. The king at first appeared highly exasperated at this outrage on his authority; but finding there was no remedy, and having himfelf alfo just cause to be offended with the minister. who was very near as arbitrary as ever the conftable had been, he fuffered himfelf to be pacified by the queen, and A.D.1432. beftowed his confidence on her brother the count de Maine, who had been one of the most active in feizing Trimouille, and who was excited to this behaviour by the promife of the conftable that he fhould be his fucceffor.

> Charles went yet farther : he called a kind of affembly of the flates at Tours, where his chancellor declared in his name to the affembly, that the king was not offended with those who had feized la Trimouille, but held them ftill in his good graces. This was the third time that the conftable had changed the ministry by violence; and yet, at the perfuation of the count de Maine, the king was reconciled to him, and received him again at court as if nothing had happened y. The modern hiftorians fay, that Charles, who was young and much addicted to his pleafures, hated bufinefs, and was very glad to let any body govern, provided they left him to divert himfelf in peace. He was certainly young, amorous, and well enough pleafed with spectacles; but he was very far from wanting either parts or courage, and he very often flewed both when they were leaft expected; but hitherto he had been always governed, and those who governed him did his bufinefs well. Many of the princes and great lords were both able and inclined to ferve him, but they would do it, in their own way; and, whatever might be in his will, it was certainly not in his power, to render them more fubmillive . He faw, therefore, that, by purfuing his pleafures, to which he was no enemy, his own affairs and those of the flate would not fuffer; fince the nobility, who affected to be independent, were willing and able enough to carry on the war. He knew that the conflable, though very impetuous and over-bearing, was an excellent officer, had a great influence over his brother, and had the honour of the crown and the welfare of the public fincerely at heart, which were motives fufficient not to make him very difficult about a reconciliation; but, befides all this, he very well knew, that how much foever he might be obliged to ftoop, while his crown was in difpute, he might refume the monarch at any time, when in full poffeffion of his dominions. He contented himfelf, therefore, with being a fpectator, and with carrying on fome intrigues with the duke of Orleans in England, which turned highly to his advantage. In the mean time fome infurrections in A.D. 1413. the Low Countries embarrafied the duke of Burgundy; and his fifter, the duchefs of Bedford, dving, fome difputes arofe between him and the regent, who, without confulting him, had married a fecond wife. The cardinal of Winchefter, in order to reconcile them, propofed an interview at St. Omer's, to which place they both came, but, notwithflanding, never met; for the duke of Burgundy infifting upon the first visit, they withdrew more exafperated than ever, each determined to purfue his own meafures ª.

now bore that title, made a potent diversion on the fide of Burgundy, notwithstanding he had married the duke's. fifter. At first, in all probability, the war was in earnest, but by degrees they fell to treat, and at length they made a particular treaty, which produced fome infinuations of the king's inclination to compromife the difputes that had A D.1434. fo long fublifted between them. The conflable then renewed his intercourfe with the duke of Burgundy, who perceiving that he flould find equal inconveniences in cafe the English prevailed, refolved to treat at once, and fecure to himfelf those advantages which could not well be refused him, as things then flood. In the mean time the duke of Orleans, in concert with king Charles, had amufed the government in England with the hopes of an advantageous treaty of peace, which was to be negotiated at Calais. The defign of this profession feems to have been to procure the confent of the English court to treat at any rate; to which measure, when they had once yielded, they could not avoid fending their plenipotentiaries to Arras, where two legates were arrived, one from the pope, and the other from the council at Bafle, and where the duke of Burgundy not only affifted by his minilters, but alfo in perfon .

The offers made by the French plenipotentiaries were the duchies of Normandy and Guienne entire, the ufual homage only referved, which the English ministers abfolutely and fcornfully rejected ; infifting, that both parties fhould keep what they had got, excepting only the ex-Good, duke change of fuch towns and diffricts on both fides as were fituate within each other's general bounds, and might thereby prove the fource of new difputes. As they would not depart in the least from these terms, the mediators declared in favour of the propositions made by Charles; and upon this declaration, the English plenipotentiaries withdrew d. This was precifely what king Charles and the duke of Burgundy wanted, who had already fettled, at least in a good measure, all their disputes; and the treaty being quickly reduced into form, was figned and ratified by both parties. It was mortifying enough, in many refpects, to the monarch who made it, and as advantageous, in all respects, to the duke of Burgundy, as he could defire. Therefore the neceffity on the one hand, and the advantages expected on the other, fecured the king against any reproaches for making a treaty, which, in many refpects, derogated from his dignity, and which would have been highly prejudicial to his interest, if he could, with any propriety, be faid to have any interest, capable of flanding in competition with the peace. In the fpace of a week after the peace was concluded, Ifabella, queen-dowager of France, died of a broken heart, occasioned, in a great measure, as the French historians fay, by the reproaches thrown upon her by the English foldiers, who told her, to her face, that fhe knew her fon Charles to have no relation to the king her hufband. She had lived long in a private condition ; her death made little imprefiion, and her coffin being put into a boat, with four of her domellies, was fent by water to St. Denis, and there interred, without fo much as a bilhop to perform the funeral ccremonies. In her will the expressed great tendernefs for the regent duke of Bedford, whom fhe ftyled her fon. There has been a tomb crected for her fince, though it cannot be faid, with any propriety, to do honour to her memory, fince a wolf is placed at the feet of her effigies, as a fymbol of her cruel, rapacious, and unnatural difpolition . In the month of December following died the regent duke of Bedford, at Rouen, concerning whom the French and English historians feem to contend which shall speak best. He was in all respects, one of the ableft and braveft men of his time, equally respected and regretted by both nations. The French recovered this A.D.1435. vear Dieppe, and feveral other places in Normandy; and the ill reception the duke of Burgundy's notification of his treaty met with in England gave them good reafon to hope, that this prince, who by this peace was become neuter, would be, in confequence of it, obliged to declare himfelf their ally; though this was far enough from being his original intention f.

The conftable of France, though he had not an army fufficient to attempt the fiege, laboured to diffrefs the city of Paris, by a diftant blockade, and preventing regular fupplies of provifions, in which aim he fucceeding fo far as to make the inhabitants very uneafy h. Sir Robert Willoughby commanded in that capital with a garrifon of about fifteen hundred men; and as long as the duke of Burgundy was in the English interest, held the people in great order; but, after the treaty of Arras, he found himfelf under great difficulties, which put him under the neceffity of treating them more feverely; upon which they entered into a fecret negociation with the conftable, and offered, provided they might have a general indemnity, and a confirmation of their privileges, to feize one of their gates, and to admit his forces. This the conftable readily promited, and undertook that the king should confirm it: and, having surprised a part of the garrifon, the citizens fulfilled their promife, and delivered him one of their gates: the English governor, Willoughby, affifted by fuch prelates as yet adhered to king Henry's intereft, did all that was poffible to repel the French, and preferve the place; and at length, when this was found impossible, retired into the Bastile, where they were prefently blocked up i. Some difputes arofe whether any terms flould be offered, or whether they thould infift upon their furrendering at difcretion; but the conftable, perceiving that the people of Paris inclined to treat the English garrifon mildly, he offered that they fhould be fent to Rouen, either by land or water : they chofe the latter conveyance, and the capitulation was punctually executed k.

This glorious action reftored the conftable entirely to his mafter's favour, who did not immediately repair to Paris, but first folemnized the marriage of his fon the dauphin with a princess of Scotland, Margaret daughter to James II. and next took care to regulate every thing in the best manner polible in the provinces on the other fide of the Loire. and fuspecting that they encouraged infurrections in the Low Countries, declared openly in favour of France, and with a numerous army belieged Calais. But the duke of Gloucester going over with a competent strength, compelled him to raife the fiege, and afterwards ravaged Artois, and other provinces adjacent. The duke of York likewife landing in Normandy, with a body of English troops, quickly recovered most part of the French conquefts, and made the neceffary dispositions for taking the field early the next fpring with a competent army, while a formidable rebellion in the Low Countries put it out of the power of the duke of Burgundy to give his new allies any kind of affifiance.

The winter proving very hard, general Talbot, one of The kine the ableft and most fortunate of the English officers, took makes his advantage of a great fall of fnow, and, having dreffed his entry into foldiers in white, furprifed Pontois; and the French, who made a like attempt upon Rouen, not only failed, but fuffered extremely in their retreat. The parliament and other fovereign courts being returned to Paris, the inhabitants were very defirous the king fhould alfo return thither; but Charles, who knew the rumours that had been fpread to his prejudice, perfifted in the refolution he had formed, of not going thither till he had performed fome action of importance; he fent orders, therefore, to the conftable, to affemble a body of troops to beliege Montreau, which, by commanding the Seine, gave the people at Paris much diffurbance; as the place was ftrong, and had a good garrifon, it made an obstinate defence; however, when an affault was practicable, the king affifted in perfon, passed the ditch up to the middle, mounted the ladder that was raifed against the breach, and was among the first who entered the place, which was quickly taken, the garrifon retiring into the caftle, which alfo capitulated in a few days<sup>1</sup>. This exploit had the effect the king proposed; it raifed his reputation highly, and contributed not a little to the universal joy that was expressed at his making a folemn entry into Paris, on the 17th of November, after an absence of about nineteen years m. In the mean time the conftable, with fome difficulty, took Meaux; but, having belieged Avranges, general Talbot furprifed his forces, and conftrained him to raife the fiege. The king was fo much chagrined at this check, that he fent orders to the conftable to keep the army affembled, in order to undertake fome other enterprize; but, from the licence of those times, that fcheme was found impracticable ; upon which the king, by the advice of the conflable and chief officers, contrived the beft plan of difcipline that the then flate of his affairs would admit. Having provided for the conftant and regular pay of the forces, he declared his intention to fee that plan carried into execution for the public benefit, and without refpect of perfons; which, though perfectly well intended, was, however, very ill taken, by many who found their private account in the public diforders, and pretended that paft fervices were ill requited ; becaufe, after having defended the king's fubjects, they were not allowed to plunder them'. But Charles, who faw the reafonablenefs of A.D '433. the new regulations, and who also forefaw their confequences, though he gave good words to the malecontents, remained firm to his refolution, which was in effect the first attempt made to introduce a true scheme of duty. and to fubject military men to military laws".

he propofed to fhut himfelf up in a fortrefs; to which propofal the conflable anfwered, "Remember the fate of Richard of England "." The king then began to arm, fent a herald to demand his fon from the duke of Alencon, and, with the few troops he had about him, marched directly against the malecontents; who, when they came to raife a rebellion in earness; found themfelves strangely mistaken; for most of the cities shut their gates against them, and fent troops and money to the king. The dauphin then applied himfelf to the duke of Burgundy, who assure the first friendship, and, as a mark of it, promifed to fend an envoy to recommend him to the clemency of the king.

Thus abandoned he retired with the duke of Bourbon into his domains, where they quickly received a meffage, requiring them to come to court, which they refolved to obey; becaufe the count of Dunois, who deferted them early to throw himfelf at the king's feet, had been received into full favour. They fet out with La Tremouille, Chaumont, and de Prie; but when they came within half a league of Cuffet, where the king was, they received an intimation that those lords had no favour to expect y. The dauphin would have retired with them, but the duke of Bourbon advised and prevailed upon him to proceed. Upon their arrival the king bid the dauphin retire to his apartment; the duke kneeling to kifs his hand, he faid, " This is not the first time you have offended me, but take my advice, and let it be the laft." The dauphin came . next day to his father, told him he had engaged his word to the three lords, and that, if he would not pardon them, he would leave the place. "With all my heart (replied Charles), the gate is open ; and, if you don't think it wide enough, I will order twenty yards of the wall to be broke down z." However, the dauphin flaid, and his father changed all his domeffics, except his confessor and his cook. Thus ended this piece of confusion, which was ftyled the Praguerie, or Briguerie. While the dauphin was employed in diffurbing his father's government, the earls of Somerfet and Dorfet, with the famous general Talbot, belieged Harfleur. the duke of Burgundy, out of pure generofity, as the French authors affirm; our records, however, much reduce the duke of Burgundy's favour; by which an end was put to the feuds between the two families. The two princes exchanged their orders of the Golden Fleece and the Porcupine; and the duke of Orleans, as foon as he was releafed, married the daughter of the duke of Cleves, who was the duke of Burgundy's niece. With this close conjunction between the two dukes, king Charles was fo much difpleafed, that he would not permit the A. The king, perceiving how much his reputation was Charles dirailed, by the vigour he had thewn in fupprelling the finguifhes malecontents, refolved to command his army in perfon, himself and to carry on the war with fpirit, which was the more in reducing Pontoife. neceffary, as the duke of York had returned into France. with the title of regent, after the death of the earl of Warwick. His first enterprize was against Creil, upon the Oife, which he took after a fiege of no long continuance; and this encouraged him to inveft Pontoife, a place of great confequence to the Parifians, who therefore applauded the king highly on this expedition; but the place was not taken with the fame facility b. The duke of York and general Talbot relieved the place five feveral times, and many of the nobility began to quit the army, their time of fervice being expired . The A.D. 1441. king withdrew to Poffi, where hearing that the people of ---Paris made very free with his character, he returned fuddenly before the place, and ordered a general affault to be given on the 10th of September, in which he mounted the breach in perfon, entered the town at the head of his troops, and carried it by ftorm. This adventure once more established his reputation, and shewed, what his grandfather was too wife a man ever to fliew, that it was not for want of courage he fometimes declined action, but becaufe he thought he had about him better officers than himfelf. The dauphin was there alfo, and behaved as became him, for he was now all fubmiffion; and as his great talent was diffimulation, he performed his part perfeetly well, and the king, who was honeft and brave, never fuspected the deceit.

New troubles excited in the kingdorn by the dukes of Orleans, Burgundy, and Bretagne.

The king marched next fpring into Poltou, being abfolutely bent upon reducing the governors of cities and fortreffes in those parts to an exact discipline, in which defign the duke of Orleans, who had great eflates thereabouts concurred, and the king received this mark of fubmiffion with great civility, though he knew very well the correspondence he held, and the fteps he was taking. On his arrival at Limoges, the whole fcheme broke out. and he received deputies from the princes and great lords who were disposed to think that he managed public affairs very ill, and that it was impofible he should manage them otherwife, till he conformed in all things to their The dukes of Orleans, Burgundy, and Breadvice. tagne, excited thefe complaints, and were feconded by the dukes of Bourbon and Alencon, with the whole body of the ancient malecontents. Charles, by the mouth of the bishop of Clermont, condescended to enter into the whole detail of the grievances which they produced. and proved plainly, that many of them did not fubfift : that others flowed either from themfelves or their crea-, tures; and that he was very willing to redrefs the reft, as foon as it fhould be in his power d. He conducted himfelf, upon this occasion, with great temper and moderation, but, at the fame time, with dignity and firmnefs. After he had given his answer, he added, that he was much obliged to the duke of Orleans for the great concert he had for the public, and was very fenfible of the hardfhips he must have fuffered in twenty-five years captivity; and, therefore, fetting all difputes alide, if he would come and thare the amufements of the Whitfunholidays with him at Limoges, he fhould have no caufe to repent of his journey.

The king, by taking off the duke of Orleans, d.flipares the league of the malecontents.

This meffage brought the duke, whom the king received very gracioufly, gave him one hundred and forty thoufand franks towards his ranfom, and fettled a handfome penfion on him, out of refpect to his patriotifm<sup>e</sup>. Orleans immediately acquainted the dukes of Burgundy and Bretagne that they were quite mifinformed as to the king, who was the wifeft and beft prince in the world: and thus the old malecontents were once more left to his mercy. The king, after having diffipated this form, profecuted his march into Languedoc, in order to fave the town of Fortas, which belonged to the lord of Albret,

"The fieur de Albret had ferved Charles with the utmost fidelity, in his lowest fortunes; the king, who was the most grateful prince of his age, was bent upon this expedition, which the malecontents had made it a point to prevent. He carried it however with a high hand, kept the day, and offered the English battle, who, being much inferior in number, declined it; but very honourably releafed the fon of the ficur de Albret, whom his father had given in holtage for the performance of this agreement f. The defire of peace continued ftill equally ftrong, becaufe with Eng- the necessity of it was equally felt by both parties; and, therefore, to fatisfy their fubiccts, the two kings, Charles and Henry, confented to a kind of congress at Tours. where, after many altercations, a truce was concluded, to commence the middle of May this year, and to end on to the king's the first of April in the next 1. At the fame time a marriage treaty was adjusted between king Henry and the princels Margaret, daughter to Rene the titular king of Naples, duke of Lorrain and Bar. This truce, as the French hiftorians fay, was a great ftroke in politics on the fide of the English ministers; but in England it was confidered in a very different light; and the authors of it were looked upon, and fome of them at leaft fuffered in the end, as traitors. Be this as it may, both parties then boafted of their moderation, and both were equally at a lofs what to do with the troops they had on foot, that they might not be tempted to make war for themfelves when no longer employed by the two crowns. Charles thought this a point of fuch confequence, that he confented his fon thould lead a numerous army for the fervice of the houfe of Auftria, against the Switzers; and the English, who apprehended the fame inconvenience, took this opportunity to fend a body of fix or eight thousand under his command k. The king, at the head of another army, marched to beliege the city of Metz, in the quarrel of Rene of Anjou, duke of Lorrain. The dauphin made himfelf mafter of Montbelliard by composition, and defeated a body of Swifs troops near Bafil; but, at the request of the council that was still fitting, he entered into a negociation with the cantons, and concluded the first treaty that was ever made between them and the crown of France<sup>1</sup>. On the other fide, the king, finding a much more obflinate reliftance than he expected from the citizens of Metz, came at length to a composition. He agreed to accept of a very large fum of money for the cxpences of the war; and procured, at the fame time, the release of a large debt that was due from his brother-inlaw the duke of Lorrain to that city. On the return of thefe armies into France, the king, with the affiftance of the dauphin, the princes of the blood, and the great lords,

At the fame time, he made use of the best of the troops, now divided into regular corps, and a proper fund fettled for their affiftance, to fcour the roads, and to keep the country clear of thieves and vagabonds; by which the public tranquility was fooner and more effectually reflored than, after fo long and bloody a war, could have been eafily imagined.

At this period, he acted with proper temper, and a just regard to the state of his own affairs, and those of his neighbours, when he declined entering into a formal war with the flate of Genoa, which, after having, in express terms, demanded his protection, and received his affiftance, excluded his troops, and refufed to comply with their engagements; but he kept Final, which they had put into his hands, and referred their chaftifement to a more convenient time ". In the like manner he let flip the claim of the duke of Orleans to the duchy of Milan, which, by the affiftance of the power of France, he might possibly have made good. But Charles, who had his own quiet and the good of his fubjects in view, did not care to plunge himfelf into a new war on the other fide the Alps, before his people had recovered themfelves from the miferies and misfortunes to which they were exposed during the weak reign of his unfortunate father. The place being taken - by capitulation, he ordered his troops to return into their quarters, infifting that, by this measure he had not at all infringed the truce. As the fituation of Henry's affairs made the renewing of the war very inconvenient to him, he chofe to receive in good part an apology that would have been looked upon as an infult, while the dukes, either of Bedford or of York, were intrufted with the management of his concerns in that kingdom.

> The care that Charles had taken to improve thefe few years of peace, had been attended with all the fuccefs he could expect, fo that the face of the country was quite changed, and all the great cities were fuddenly, and, in a manner, imperceptibly repeopled. On the other hand, he had omitted nothing that might raife his reputation abroad, having, with great prudence and policy, composed that fehifm which had fo long diffurbed the church; he had likewife renewed his treaty with James the Second, king of Scots, on very honourable terms for that prince, notwithstanding the demise of the dauphines his fifter; and, from the fame degree of forefight, had renewed his engagements with the crown of Caftile; fo that his concerns were in as good a condition as he could defire for renewing the war, which, however, it is probable, he would have deferred for fome time longer, if the unaccountable infatuation of the English had not put it out of his power. The duke of Somerfet had been, by the queen's faction, fent over to replace the duke of York, whom the both hated and feared; and he fuffered Sir Francis Surienne, knight of the Garter, but an Arragonefe by birth, to furprife Fougeres, a rich town on the frontiers of Bretagne, two months before the truce expired P. The duke of Bretagne complained of this violence to both kings, infifting on reftitution from the one, and demanding affiftance from the other. Charles, according to his accustomed manner, declined proceeding with vigour, and confented to conference after conference, but, in the mean time, provided filently and fpeedily for the war he meditated. After providing for a divertion on the fide of Scotland, the affiftance of a Spanish fleet, and an offensive and defensive alliance with the duke of Bretagne, he first began as his auxiliary, and, as foon as every thing was difpoled for the execution of his feheme, declared in his own name, and followed that declaration by entering Normandy, with four armies at once, the ftrongeft of which he commanded in perfon 9. The duke of Somerfet and general Talbot exerted themfelves in putting garrifons into the ftrongest places; a precaution which, however, difabled them from taking the field, and fcarce left them troops fufficient for the defence of Rouen.

The French armies were fo numerous, and fo well fup- Charles plied, that, in a few weeks, they made many conquefts : fizes this and, in the month of October, the count of Dunois appear- and reduces ed with his troops in order of battle before Rouen, in hopes Rouen. of exciting a revolt, but without effect. This unfuccefsful attempt had an event very different from what both parties expected; for, though hitherto the inhabitants had been divided into parties, yet the next day, from very different motives, they unanimoully agreed to compel their governor to furrender the town. According- A.D. 1449, ly, having extorted his confent, they fent their deputies to treat with king Charles, who confented to all their demands, which were, an act of oblivion, the confirmation of their privileges, and leave for fuch as defired it, to retire to England. ing their valour, but kept them blocked up till the appearance of famine obliged them to treat. The duke demanded leave to retire, which the king granted, provided they rendered Honfleur, Harfleur, and the reft of the places they possible at the mouth of the Seine. To these conditions, at length (Harfleur excepted) Somerset agreed; and, with infinite regret, was forced to give general Talbot as a hostage for the performance of articles. The king made his entry into Rouen, with great fplendor, on the 10th of November; and, though it was folate in the feason, and his troops were fo much fatigued, he caufed Harfleur to be invelted, which was reduced before the end of the year; an event which put him in possibilition of all Normandy on that fide the Seine<sup>3</sup>.

The fair opportunity the French now had of completing the conqueft of Normandy, banifhed all diffinctions of feafons. Some domeflic troubles, however, hindered the king from profecuting the war, as he intended, without interruption, and gave time to the Englifh general Kyreil, who landed with a body of three thoufand men, to reduce Valogne; but the young count of Clermont, eldeft fon to the duke of Bourbon, marching againft him, the two armies engaged near the village of Fournigni, and the French, being fortunately joined by the conflable with fome frefh troops, and fome of the officers on the other fide mifbehaving, Sir Thomas Kyreil was defeated and taken prifoner, with the lofs of about five thoufand men.

This action, which happened on the 15th of April, was decifive as to the fate of Normandy; for at leaft one half of thefe Englifh troops being drawn out of the garifons, left them fo much weaker, a circumftance of which the king did not fail to profit; for he immediately caufed Caen to be invefted, into which the duke of Somerfet had retired with about four thoufand men. The place was ftrong, and well fortified, fo that when the conftable came before it on the 5th of June, it was believed it would make a long defence. Upon the king's airival in the camp, he caufed the outworks to be attacked; and, though repulfed with lofs, made another attempt the next day, in which he fucceeded: he then fprung a mine with fuch fuccefs as obliged the duke to capitulate, and the garifon marched out with all the honours of war on the 1ft of July; but the king caufed him and his garrifon to be transported to England ", at his own expence; and prefently after ordered Falaise and Domfront to be invested. This laft place being within land, the king left it to be taken at leifure, but directed Cherbourg to be pushed with all the vigour imaginable, fo that it furrendered on the 12th of Auguft, by which all Normandy was recovered in fomething more than a year w. Before the end of the year, fome progrefs was made in the reduction of Guienne; but it is now time to fpeak of those intrigues that embittered all these profperities, and filled Charles with chagrin, while his kingdom refounded with acclamations for his victories.

The dauphin, after his famous expedition into Guienne, Lewis and reduction of the count of Armagnac, demanded the dauphin king's leave to return into Dauphine, which, after fome retires into deliberation, was granted. At the head of thefe was Pierre de Brefe, seneschal of Poitou, a man of high quality and great merit : him he charged with crimes of all forts, against the crown, the public welfare, and the king's perfon, demanding that he fhould be divefted of power, and left to a fair trial. The king immediately complied, removed him from his feat in council, from all his employments, and from his prefence; and then ordered his procefs to be formed. From having the faireft, he had the fouleft character in France; all the world abandoned him, and many became his accufers; they had every advantage given them; but, upon a full trial, there could be nothing proved : the king gave him immediately the government of Rouen, and reffored him, if poslible, to more credit than he had before, which of confequence recalled

(A) It is very certain, that one of the great caufes of the mifunderstanding between the king and his fon the dauphin. was the averfion of the latter to Agnes Sorel, to whom it is faid, he once gave a blow on the cheek, which might probably draw upon him great fufpicions when that lady came to die, as it was commonly conceived by poifon. By her will James Cœur, the king's goldfmith, that is, the perfon intrusted with the management of his finances, was named one of her exccutors ; and yet he was accufed of being the inftrument of her death; and this proved three years afterwards, one of the principal caufes of his difgrace, though, upon a frict examination, he was acquitted of that charge. James Cœur was the fon of a merchant of Bourges, came early to court, and being intrusted in money affairs, acquitted himfelf with great honour and reputation. It is very difficult to know which he did beft, the king's bulinefs or his own: for he was the richest fubject of that age in Europe. The chemifts have from thence taken occafion to put him into the lift of their adepts ; but his philofophers flone was commerce, which he carried on to all parts of the then known world. It is true, that, for the fupport of it, he made use both of the king's money and credit; but, on the other hand, whenever it was neceffary, the king had likewife the ufe of his (1). It was this James Coeur who put his affairs in order, enabled him to carry into action his project for difciplining the army ; he devifed the method of maintaining the new militia, and managed the public treafure fo carefully, that in the midft of his misfortunes his masternever oppreffed either clergy or laity by new or extraordinary impofition. On the contrary, when the fervice required it, he was always ready to furnifly money out of his private fortune, which if he had not done, the

The count de Dunois, whom the king for his past fervices had created count de Longueville, rendered him fuch as were still more important in Guienne, where he profecuted the war with fuch vigour and fuccefs, that, in the thort interval between May and August, he reduced all that country, which had been fo long in the hands of the English, and which was remarkably well affected to them *. It is true that Bourdeaux fubmitted on a capitulation, un- paign. der which all the adjacent diftrict was comprehended, by which the king precluded himfelf from ever impoling on the inhabitants any greater taxes than those to which they were fubject at this time, and promifed to eftablish a parliament, or fovereign court of judicature, at Bourdeaux, where all things relative to that province were to be finally determined b. He was also intruffed with fome important negociations in Italy, which were likewife expensive; and yet all thefe great things could not preferve him; for being acculed of a variety of crimes, rather through envy of his power and wealth, than from any real caufe, he was fentenced to pay a fine of four hundred thousand crowns, to forteit his effate, and to fuffer perpetual banishment; but, upon a revision not long after, the parliament declared him innocent, and reftored him to his honours and effate. At the time his misfortunes fell upon him, his factors in foreign countries lent him fixty thousand crowns, with which he retired into Cyprus, married a fecond wife, by whom he had children, for whom he procured various folid eftablishments, and became through his industry and integrity, more opulent than ever. He was indeed, in all refpects, one of the ableft and most extraordinary men of his time; and his ill ufage is, by all historians reprefented as the greateft blemish of this reign. The ficur Dammartin was the great author of this violence, and felt the weight of a like perfecution in the next reign.

The count of Longueville, having reduced all Guienne, with the title of the king's lieutenant-general, left, by the king's orders. the command to the count de Clermont, whom he effablished his governor in those parts.

The dauphin, who governed his own country as a fovereign, held an intercourfe with, and made himfelf refpectcd by all the princes in Europe, maintaining a proper behaviour towards every one, except his father. He did not, however, treat him with any exterior marks of difrefpect; those were only bestowed upon his ministers; but he negociated on every fide, and took his measures as if he had not been either the son or the subject of Charles. At length Lewis carried this conduct fo far as to conclude a treaty of marriage between himfelf and the princefs Charlotte, daughter to the duke of Savoy, not only without the king's confent, but in direct breach of his command ; upon which Charles came to Bourges, and, without mentioning any particular caufe, declared war against the duke; but before any hostilities were committed, the cardinal d'Eftouteville came to the king from the duke, and fo pacified him that a peace was concluded at Feurs in Forez, one article of which was, that the duke's fon fhould marry the princeis Joland, or Violante, the king's daughter . This fudden turn was not the effect of weakness or mutability in the king, but of an event which he could not either forefee or avoid. His defire to eafe his new fubiects in Guienne induced him to leave as few troops there as poffible; this opportunity tempted the people, who were fiill English in their hearts, to invite their former masters to return. Charles, that he might obtain Cherbourg the fooner, had been content to make that place the price of general Talbot's liberty, who, from a hoftage, became a prisoner of war, on the governor of Honfleur's refusing to furrender that place in obedience to the duke of Somer-A.D. 1452. fet's orders. This general, thus at liberty, landed with five thousand English troops, was admitted by the inhabitants into Bourdeaux, furprifed the French garrifon, and, being fupported by a fleet and army from England, quick-

It was this reverfe of affairs that engaged the king to act as he did, that he might be at liberty to ftiffe effectually that flame which had been once put out already; and which, if at all neglected, might quickly grow too ftrong for the forces he had on foot d.

He began the campaign in Guienne early next year; Earlof He began the campaign in Gunanic carly hour just shrew, and, in the first place that was taken, caufed about eighty Shrew, perfons to be beheaded as traitors. On the 17th of July, inthe bastle general Talbot, contrary to his own fentiments, and purely of Caffillon. to gratify the people of Bourdeaux, attacked the French which dearmy before Castillon, in their entrenchments : though at cides the first he was fuccessful, yet his horse being killed by a can- fate of non fhot, and himfelf immediately after by a wound in the throat, his forces were defeated; and, though the lofs was not very great in the action, yet, in its confequences, it proved the lofs of Guienne. Caftillon immediately furrendered at diferention, and many other places followed this example. The king proceeded very cautioufly with refpect to Bourdeaux, in which there was a garrifon of four thoufand Englifh, and as many Gafcons. He formed the blockade by land and fea, as faft as poffible; but he proceeded very flowly to the fiege, and kept the fame meafure during the time it continued. All this time the dauphin was, in appearance, a quiet fpectator of his father's good fortune, who, with all his wildom, knew not how to act towards his fon. At certain times, when his orders quadrated with his own views, rection, de- the dauphin was exactly obedient; but when he received commands of another kind, he understood these to proceed from the ministers, and paid no regard to them at all. He interfered in the wars of Italy, to the prejudice of his father-in-law, the duke of Savoy; and, upon that prince's prefuming to diflike this interpolition, he declared war against him, and resolved to make himself master of the marquifate of Saluces; but the duke of Burgundy and the Swifs cantons interpoling, he found it expedient to make peace ". The king, who had an eye upon all his actions, who had now borne with him ten years, and often fummoned him to court, at length determined to make him fenfible of his duty; and, under colour of a tour into Auvergne, difpofed every thing for feizing him in Dauphiné : Anthony de Chabannes, lord of Dammartin, being charged with the command of the troops that were to be employed in this enterprize, no fooner began to move, than the dauphin applied to the duke of Savoy, and demanded affistance both in money and forces. To prevent this, Chabannes received the king's orders to go himfelf to the duke's court, where he had the ftrongest affurances from that prince, that the dauphin fhould receive no fupport from him b. Upon this declaration, the duke thewed all poffible refpect to this illuftrious exile; and the dauphin thereupon demanded troops only to compel his father, as he phrafed it, to change his ministers. " Sir," answered the duke, " against anv other perfon, my forces and my finances are at your devotion; but it is not either you or I who have a right to preferibe to the king; and indeed I do not fee a wifer measure for us both to take in the management of our affairs, than to refer them to the good pleafure of a prince, alike remarkable for his prudence and his moderation m." The A.D.14:6. dauphin, finding he could do no better, made choice of -Genep, on the frontiers of Hainault, for the place of his refidence, and accepted of a penfion of three thousand florins a month for his fubliftance, which, as fome writers inform us, was afterwards advanced to double that fum.

The duke of Burgundy, who was a very wife prince, eafily forefaw, that, fooner or later, this affair must occafion a mifunderstanding between him and the crown of France, either in the perfon of Charles or of Lewis; he fent, therefore, two of his chamberlains, John de Croi and Simon de Lalain, to endeavour to reconcile the dauphin to his father; and to propofe, that, till this reconciliation could be effected, the dauphin might be permitted to put himfelf at the head of an army, and to act against the Turks, who were growing every day more and more formidable to the Christian powers. The king testified his fatisfaction as to the duke's conduct in the whole affair; but did not at all approve the expedient of putting his fon at the head of an army, alleging, it would be more agreeable to his intereft, as well as his duty, to return into France, and occupy that place in his father's councils, to which nature, both by his birth and his capacity, had given him fo fair a title". Upon the receipt of this anfwer, the dauphin fent for his confort, whom he had never yet feen; and the duke of Burgundy caufed her to be conducted into the Low Countries, with all the refpect and magnificence due to her own rank, and that of the prince fhe had efpoufed; in the mean time the king met

A confeira- with a new mortification, through the difcovery of the treason of the duke of Alençon. This prince, at a time when he was diffreffed for money, had fold the town of Fougeres to the duke of Bretagne, at a low price. His affairs being now in better order, he was defirous of having it again, upon repayment of the fame money, which the duke of Bretagne having refused to accept, he applied for redrefs to the king, who, on one fide, having no reafon to be fatisfied with this duke's conduct, and, on the other, having great reason to manage the duke of Bre-A D.1457. tagne, took little notice of this application °. The duke of Alencon, provoked at this indifference, applied to the king of England, laid open to him the ftate of affairs in France, made a treaty for the marriage of his daughter with the fon of the duke of York, and concerted measures for putting the English once more in possession of Normandy. When this scheme was ripe for execution, he chose a mean perfon to go over with letters to king Henry, which he put up in a hollow ftaff, who carried them directly to king Charles. When this monarch was thus unexpectedly apprifed of the duke's treachery, he could not help exclaiming, "In whom can I now put any truft, when the very princes of my own blood confpire against me." He immediately dispatched his old faithful fervant, the count de Longueville, in order to arreft the duke of Alencon, whom he refolved to bring, by an open and public trial, to iuffice P.

> After he had been detained a long time in prifon, and the king had caufed a ftrift enquiry to be made into the privileges and prerogatives of the peers of France, and the duke of Burgundy, as the first peer, to be fummoned, he held a parliament at Vendofme, where the duke of Alençon had all the advantages allowed him that the formalities of law could give; but the meffenger entrufted with his letters, the letters themfelves, and the duke's own confession, leaving no room to doubt of his guilt, he was convicted, and condemned to fuffer death 9. The duke of Burgundy, though he refused to affift at his trial, fent ambaffadors to intercede for him; a circumftance the more extraordinary, as it was ftrongly fuspected he himfelf and the dauphin were far from being ignorant of his intrigues; but the king thought proper to declare these sufpicions

He flewed more refpect to that of the conftable, Arthur, duke of Bretagne, who had just acquired that dignity by the death of his nephew, and, at his requeft, converted the fentence into perpetual impriforment in the caftle of Loches"; from whence, as we fhall fee, he was delivered in the fucceeding reign. In order to find fome employment for the English at home, and to prevent their diffurbing his dominions, the king fent Peter de Breze, fenefchal of Normandy, to infult their coafts. Accordingly, making a defcent, he burnt and plundered the town of Sandwich, in which expedition, as the French hiftorians own, the king acted in concert with queen Margaret of England, who had but two much power over her hufband, and became thereby the fource of his misfortunes and those of his fubjects. At the fame time the king renewed his treaties with Denmark and Spain, that, in cafe of a revolution in England, which might be accompanied with a revival of the war, he might not be without allies. He took the fame precaution with refpect to the emperor and feveral princes of Germany, that the duke of Burgundy might fee he would not be found unprepared, if that prince, at the perfuation of his fon, fhould undertake any thing to his prejudice t. The profperous fituation of the king's affairs induced Charles rethe Genoele, or at least one of the factions in Genoa, to duces the propole putting the republic again under the protection of govern-France; a propofal which the king received with a good grace; and fent John duke of Calabria, the eldeft fon of back again Rene, king of Naples, to govern that city in his name. ferent historians, that it is difficult to understand, and confequently to reconcile them. Some fay, that the dauphin had governed there fo wifely, as to make himfelf effeemed as much as most fovereigns; fo that he was highly admired by his fubjects: others allege, that he ruined and opprefied them, fo that they complained of him in the ftrongeft terms to his father. The former affert, that the king met with great opposition from the flates, who remonstrated on the oath they had taken to his fon, and feemed unwilling to put themfelves again under the rule of the father; in all which reports there is a mixture of truth and of fallhood. The dauphin certainly did not want abilities for government; nor did he fail to give proofs of them in Dauphinć, where, during the whole time of his refidence, he affected in all things a perfect independence, coined money, made laws, created a parliament, and acted in every other respect as a fovereign prince, which, for a time, flattered the natives exceedingly. But then, to fupport all this independency, he levied great fums, was perpetually foliciting free gifts, and took many other methods of filling his coffers, with which they were, and had reafon to be exceedingly displeased, more especially during the latter part of his government, when his penfion being flopt, he had no way to fupport the dignity of a prince, but with the revenues of that county. king, in refuming the government, fuppreffed thefe impofts, a meafure which was very pleafing; but he fuppreffed likewife many of those marks of independency, which his fon had eftablished, and this step was difliked °. A.D. 1469. Charles, however, did not regard either their clamours or the complaints of Lewis; he reduced things into their old form; and, if he mortified the people's vanity, he made their circumftances eafy. From hence we may eafily difern how hiftorians might represent the fame facts differently, according to their respective fystems.

The king exceedingly griewed by the dauphin's conduct.

The duke of Burgundy growing daily more and more apprehenfive of Charles's refertment, and perceiving how much he was courted by all the neighbouring princes, who were proud of entering into his alliance, fent frefh envoys to the court of France, with a long memorial of his griefs; the king anfwered this memorial, article by article, with great firength of reafon, and at the fame time with great dignity; and whereas the duke had fuggested a fecret article in the marriage treaty between Henry the Sixth and Margaret of Anjou, to his prejudice, the king affirmed it was a mere fiction, adding, that when fuch things entered the duke's mind, his beft way would have been to communicate them to the king, who would always avow the truth. In fpeaking of the dauphin, the king obferved that he could got do too much honour to the fon of his fovereign, and that he would always confider the respect paid to his perfon as paid to himself, while he took no part in the quarrel *. The dauphinefs being dclivered of a fon, Lewis fent one of his houshold to acquaint the king with it, who immediately caufed public rejoicings to be made, and wrote him a letter of felicitation with his own handy. Upon another occasion the dauphin having complained that fome who were about his father did not pay a proper regard to his requefts, the king acquainted him that he had no need to apply to any, fince he was himfelf always ready to receive, and willing to grant them, with which declaration, notwithftanding the stubbornnels of his temper, the dauphin was fo much affected, that he wrote him a very humble letter of thanks z. Some writers fuggeft that the king had thoughts of difinheriting him, but without foundation; for the quarrel was entirely on the dauphin's fide, who, being upwards of thirty, was impatient to govern, and could not bear living in his father's court as a fubject; whereas Charles was very defirous to have him at court, preffed him continually to return, and hinted that he had many things to communicate, which could not be com- A.D. 1460. mitted to paper. These circumstances are directly oppofite to the fuppofed intention of defeating his fuccession; but the whole of their difpute lay in this particular, that the father would be a king while he lived, and the fon, with all poffible professions of duty in words, could not bring himfelf to confirm those professions by his actions 2.

In the mean time the difagreement between the king Charles dies and the duke of Burgundy was growing ftill wider, and through would have probably ended in a rupture, but that both fuffenance, of them were princes of great prudence, and who had for fear of fincerely at heart the good of their fubjects; belides, the poiloning. duke was not more fortunate in a fon than the king ; the count de Charolois was of a most violent and turbulent temper, and the duke did not fpare him at all, but made him fenfible upon every occasion of the weight of his authority. He was also angry with his father's ministers, and particularly with the house of Croy. As therefore the king was unwilling to proceed to extremities, for fear the dauphin flould retire into England; fo the duke's forbearance proceeded from an apprehension that the count de Charolois might demand the king's protection b. Some overtures of this kind were indeed made; for Charles having an inclination to fupport his old competitor, Henry VI. in the day of his diftres, the count de Charolois made an offer to command his forces, which at first the king was willing to accept; but, having an intimation that the count de Charolois meditated fome other defign. and was inclined to commit fome act of violence on his father's ministers, he wrote to him in his last fickness, a letter, in which was this remarkable fentence : " For two fuch kingdoms as my own, I would not have the leaft participation in an unworthy action "." His last fickness was of a very ftrange kind: one of his old fervants intimated to him, that he would do well to be cautious, fince he fuspected that there was a defign to poifon him, a hint which affected the king to fuch a degree, that he abfolutely refufed all fuftenance for feveral days; and being at length perfuaded to eat, it proved too late, for his bowels being collapfed, nothing would pais : in this con-A.D.1461. dition he died, at Meun in Berry, on the 22d of July, in the fixtieth year of his age, and in the thirty-ninth of his reign d. He was furnamed the Victorious, or as others fav, the Well-ferved, from which last appellation, in all probability, modern historians have derived their opinion, that the great fucceffes of his reign were wholly owing to his minifters and his generals; whereas contemporary writers, and even those who flourished in his fon's days, afcribe thefe great actions to the king himfelf, and particularly remark, that the high profperity of his arms commenced at a time when he took the refolution of commanding in perfon. It has been even matter of doubt, whether his indolence and little regard to bufinefs in the beginning of his reign, were not the effects of a refined policy, which induced him to affect a character, that, though feemingly unworthy of a king, was, notwithftand-

(B) The concerns of Charles werein fo low a fituation at his first accession to the throne. that he had not money to pay for a new pair of boots; and he was fo little feared, that the tradefman who brought them, being told fo, carried them away. He had good officers ; many of the nobility adhered to him; but most of them had their particular views, in which, if he had croffed them, they would have been loft. It is no wonder, therefore, that he bore many things which no other king would have done. At his coronotion there was not one lay peer ; but, for the fake of preferving flate, he nominated fix lords, who reprefented them. Through the whole course of his reign, every incident, every conjuncture, was turned to his advantage; at first by his ministers, and, in process of time, by himfelf. For this reason he drew as much profit from his adverfity as from his profperity. Under the former he laid afide his great courts, becaufe they were too expensive; he prohibited the currency of any money in his dominions but his own : in a word, he availed himfelf of neceffity, while his territory was very finall, to bring in those alterations which he thought for the advantage of the crown; and he made use of his power, in proportion as it became more extended, to established these new usages through the whole kingdom. The coin was never fo much debased as in his time; and yet under him it was no great evil; for, by raifing the nominal value beyond any thing that had been attempted, he drew money into the countries that owned his authority, which, but for that expedient, had never been feen; and, when this was no longer neceffary, he very wifely laid it afide. The length of the war gave him a fair opportunity to interdict private quarrels; that is, deciding them by the fword. When they afterwards attempted to turn this upon him, by alleging, that the war had fo reduced them, that they were in no condition to raife troops for his fervice; he took them at their words, and not only difpenfed with their raifing troops as the conflictution required for the prefent, but for the future ; fo that, without his permifion, they could never raife troops at all. Instead of thefe troops he brought in regular forces, for the payment of which he introduced the taille; and, by promising to put his coin on a right footing, and keep it fo, he levied this with the good will of his fubjects, but without the confent of

of his ftates. It was the gentle use of his prerogative that established it; he made likewife fome neceffary alterations in the manner of administring juffice; but he did every thing with fuch an apparent view to the public good, and was fo very tender of the lives and properties of his people, that though he altered or acted against all law, he was never confidered as a tyrant. The clergy were more attached to him than to the pope; for he took nothing of them himfelf, and defended them from being flripped by the pontiff. He was, in general, very grateful; and, though the cafe of James Cour is faid to be an exception to this character, yet, upon reading the record of his conviction, as we may call it, the reader may probably hold the king excufed ; fince, whether he was guilty or not, the appearances against him were ftrong, and the clamour of the people great; one of the charges against him being this, that to extend his own commerce, he had fcarce left another merchant in the kingdom, and had acquired most of his wealth by applying the public cafh and credit to his own profit. Excellently ferved by the men, Charles was yet more fortunate in the other fex. His confort, Mary of Anjou, loved him tenderly : fhe gave him little trouble in his amours, and great affistance in his businefs, in which the king always confulted her. Yet her mildnefs and modefty were fo confpicuous, that it appeared the rather courted his favour than acted from any motives of ambition. By her he had Lewis his fucceffor; Charles, duke of Berry; Violante, the wife of A madeus. duke of Savov; Catharine who cipoufed Charles the Hardy, duke of Burgundy ; Joan who married John duke of Bourbon; and Magdalen who efpouled Galcon, count of Foix. By Agnes de Sorel he had three daughters: Charlotte, who married lames de Brezé, count of Maulevrier, poniarded by her hufband, who caught her in the act of adultery ; Margaret, espoused to Oliver de Coëtivi : and Jane, married to Anthony de Bueil, count of Sancerre. The remains of this monarch were deposited in the royal abbey of St. Denis; but in a manner which feemed to demonftrate, that the fame good fortune that attended him through his life, was attached even to his breathlefs corpfe; for the butterflies of the court, crouding all together for Flanders, in order to enjoy the funfhine of the royal prefence, Tannegui du Chaftel, the first favourrite Charles had, took care of the funeral folemnity, which he performed very nobly at his own expence; and then retired to the court of Bretagne, being born

In the midst of the ceremony, he drew his fword, and had the honour of knighthood conferred upon him by the duke of Burgundy, at his requeft b. The duke then did him homage, not only in the amplest, but even in an unufual form, which had in it more of friendship than policy. Some days after, they made their public entry into Paris, efcorted by a great body of horfe. though there did not appear the flighteft foundation for the fuspicions the king had, that an opposition would be formed to his fucceffion . He received very graciously the good advice given him by the duke of Burgundy, and his interpolition in favour of his father's ministers, but without fuffering it to make the leaft impreffion; for he immediately turned out the chancellor, William Juvenal des Urfins, the admiral, one of the marshals of France, and a great part of the parliament d. He discharged the duke of Alencon from the caftle of Loches, and pardoned him, not from clemency, but because he had confeired against his father. As a mark of his gratitude and affection for the count of Charolois, he declared him his lieutenant-general in Normandy, with a penfion of twelve thousand crowns a year; but at the fame time, he ratified the treaty which his father had made with the people of Liege, though he knew it was made in refentment of the protection afforded to himfelf by the duke of Burgundy, and had promifed in the most folemn manner, that he would declare that alliance void, and even join with the duke against them. At Tours he received the homage of Francis the Second, duke of Bretagne; but not fatisfied with that, he made a journey into the duchy, under colour of a pilgrimage, that he might better judge of its ftrength and condition ; and, as fome fay, with an intent to fteal the princefs of Bretagne for the duke of Savoy, in which fcheme he was difappointed by a fudden froft, and thought proper thereupon to releafe her. But while he was thus employed, an infurrection happened at Rheims, where the people would not fubmit to the taxes, which was quickly reduced, and near fourfcore citizens were punished with death, in hopes of ftrengthening his authority. He had already framed in his mind the project of reftoring his kinfman John, duke of Calabria, to the kingdom of Naples, and, to gain the affiftance of pope Pius the Second, which was ablolutely neceffary, he cancelled the famous pragmatic fanction made by his father. This ftep was vehemently oppofed in parliament by his attorney-general, and that affembly abolutely refufed their confent; upon which he turned out his attorney with difgrace, and fent the original inftrument to Rome, where it was diagged through the ftreets to A.D. 1461. gratify the populace. But underhand he gave his attorney a fum of money, which was of greater value than his office, and allowed the parliament to maintain in execution, as a fundamental law, the very pragmatic fanction he had abolished . His other project was to humble the dukes of Burgundy and Bretagne, though the former had defended him in his diftrefs, and the predeceffor of the latter had fixed his father on the throne. Such were the first exploits of this famous politician ! Such the dictates of that genius, which has been confidered as worthy of dictating to kings.

The affairs of England were at this time in the moft diftreffed condition. Margaret, the confort of Henry the Sixth, had obtained from him a fmall body of troops, under the command of the famous Peter de Breze, not fo much with a view to ferve her, as to be rid of him for the prefent, and to have a fair chance of being rid of him for ever. Luis, for which he was to pay forty thousand crowns more when the flould be able to put it into his hands f. About the fame time he undertook to affift John, king of Arragon, against his fubjects, who had taken arms to revenge the death of his fon, the prince of Viana, poifoned by his mother-in-law, in favour of her own fon Ferdinand, furnamed afterwards the Catholic, as we have fhewn at large in its proper place. The French fuccours commanded by James de Armagnac, duke of Nemours, faved both the mother and the fon; and Lewis likewife lent the monarch of Arragon three hundred thousand crowns, but took care A.D. 1462. to have the counties of Roufillon and Cordagne yielded to him, fubiect however to a claufe of redemption 3. The general fituation of things was very favourable for him, and it was this that enabled him to give law to his neighbours, whofe countries were in a diffreffed and diffracted condition, to which, through the arts of his refined policy, Lewis in a flort time reduced his own; whereas a government like his father's had filled it with wealth and people.

The king of Caftile having alfo fome difputes with the monarch of Arragon, Lewis undertook to mediate between them, in confequence of which undertaking he was fuft prefent at the conferences held at Bayonne, and afterwards had an interview with the Castilian monarch, on the banks of the river Bidaffoa, which fome have thought gave birth to the implacable hatred between the two nations; for the Spanish king and his coustiers being most magnificently dreffed, and, on the contrary, Lewis with his attendants dreffed very meanly, the former treated the latter with fcorn, while the latter looked upon them with contempt. The decree made by Lewis offended the Caftilians highly, and yet gave the court of Arragon no content; but Lewis gave himfelf little trouble about either, having corrupted the minifters of both h. This was his general expedient, from whence we may fee the true reafon why he acted, generally speaking, according to his own notions; for knowing by experience that many had betrayed their trufts to him, he judged the only way to fecure his own fecrets was, to truft them to none. He was very defirous of recovering the towns upon the Somme out of the hands of the duke of Burgundy, to which he had a right, even by the treaty of Arras, on the payment of four hundred thousand crowns; and in this delign he fucceeded, by the affiftance of John de Croy, and other gentlemen of that family; who having the ear of the duke, and being extremely hated by the count de Charolois, forefaw they might one day fland in need of the king's protection. Lewis had an interview with the duke upon this occasion at Hedin, in which, according to custom, he deceived him ; for finding that he could not have the towns. unlefs he engaged to continue the governors the duke had appointed, he acquiefced; but turned them out as foon as he came into poffeilion. But, to qualify this breach of faith, he put in others that were as agreeable to the duke, by which he kept things quiet i. All this time he was treating with Francis duke of Bretagne, whom he hated for his power, and for whole parts he had a great contempt; but that prince, though no profound politician himfelf, had very able ministers, and the king, when he least fuspected it, found, that a weak man, weil advised, might be too many for a prince of parts k. The duke of A D. 1463. Savoy, being expelled his dominions by the intrigues of his younger fon Philip, had recourfe to Lewis for protection, who received him very gracioufly, and then fent for his fon, that he might reconcile them. The facility with which he had hitherto executed his defigns, and the perfuation he had of the fuperiority of his own talents, induced the king to form new projects of ftill a bolder nature. He had caufed the restitution of the three towns granted to Philip the Hardy, in favour of his marriage with Margaret of Flanders, to be mentioned to the duke of Burgundy, who rejected it with great heat; at which the king pretended much concern, and feemed defirous of difcuffing this and fome other points in a new conference at Hedin. But the real defign of this interview was of a very different nature ". He understood that the count de Charolois was at the Hague, from whence he was to make a tour to the fea coaft : upon which he ordered the Baftard de Rubempré, a debauched determined bravo, to embark on board one of his frigates, and fail with forty or fifty desperate men like himself; to land with as many of these as he thought proper, and to secure his perfon, of which, as foon as he should have received advice, his next defign was to post to Hedin, with a body of troops, in order to make fure of the duke of Burgundy's perfon. This plan milcarried through the imprudence of Rubempré; who, being feen and known in a public houfe. was ariefted on his general character: upon which, the veffel he commanded failing abruptly, gave a ftrong fufpicion of his errand : with this fuspicion the count de Charolois having acquainted his father, he retired precipitately from Hedin. The count de Charolois anfwered with great-warmth the reflections made upon his conduct, and bid the archbifhop of Narbonne, one of the ambaffadors, tell the king, that indeed his chancellor had rattled him foundly, but that he would give him good cause to repent it before the year A.D.1464. came about; which declaration was certainly a much ftronger mark of his vivacity than of his prudence.

French nobleffe, which once fubverted, all the lords in the kingdom muft lie at the king's mercy, which, by the way, they had good reafon to believe they fhould not experience in any great degree. The great men who had been turned out upon his accession, felt the fmart of that wound; the faithful fervants of his father faw themfelves diftinguished only by marks of his displeasure, and his chief ministers were not only new men, but men of low birth and bad characters. Cardinal Balue, his prime minifter, refembled his mafter; he relied upon his own arts, which he practifed fo much and fo often that nobody relied upon him. There were malecontents of all ranks; the duke of Bretagne, or rather the duke's ministers, knew how to unite them; and his emiffaries, in the habits of monks of different orders, met, conferred with, and engaged them in a confederacy for the public good 9, which every one of them underflood to be the fixing himfelf where he defired. There were two things in the conduct of this business very remarkable : the first, that upwards of five hundred engaged in it without betraying each other ; the other, that they conferred commonly in public places, mostly in the church of Notre Dame : fo that the king's fpies, who were hunting for cabals and private meetings, were abfolutely defeated r. The king, in the mean time, was pufhing the duke of Bretagne with violence, not perceiving that he had any fupport; the duke fent a minifter to gain time for him; the king laboured to corrupt that minilter ; he feemed to give way, advifed the king to advance towards the frontiers of Bretague, while he was feducing his brother, the duke of Berry, who, by accompanying the king in this journey, found means to make his efcapes. So that, with all his intelligence, the first fense of his danger arose from hearing that the duke's minifter and his brother were withdrawn together; and thus he difcerned the ftorm, just as it began to break over his head-

Battle of Montl'heri, in which both parties have the fkill to get themjelwes beaten. As foon as the duke of Berry found himfelf in fafety, he publifhed, or rather he fuffered to be publifhed in hisname, a manifefto, containing a fevere cenfure on the king's adminification; declaring the confederates had nothing in view but reviving the fpirit of the laws, relieving the people, and reftoring good government, whence they denominated their caufe the Bien Public, and ftyled their enterprize, the war of the public good '. The duke of Calabria his nephew, the duke of Bourbon his coufin, and the duke of Bretagne, and the count of Charolois, princes of his blood, the old count de Longueville his father's faithful fervant, nay, the count de Aimaguae, whom he had pardoned, and, in fhort, all the great nobility, declared for this league against the king, and placed his brother, the prefumptive heir of the crown, at their head ". They armed on both fides : the king had at first the better, and might have had fome of them at his mercy, if they had not made use of his own arts, treated with him, and, as foon as their friends made a diversion in their favour, declared again for the league ". While the king was engaged in the provinces, the count de Charolois advanced directly to Paris, in hopes of furpriling it; but the inhabitants stood on their defence. He expected to have been joined by the Bretons, but they did not come up in time, and this delay gave the king an opportunity of marching to the castle of Montl'heri, about eight leagues from Paris; neither party intended to fight, and yet, on the 16th of July, a battle enfued. The king having demanded of Peter de Breze, who commanded his vanguard, whether he had not fome intelligence with the confederates, he, to convince him of the contrary, engaged without orders *. The battle lasted five hours, and may be truly faid to have ended in the defeat of both armies; that is, each looked upon itfelf as defeated, and, in their first consternation, a great part of both armies fled above one hundred miles. After this terror was over, both fides claimed a victory, to which neither had any title. Yet the chiefs on both fides behaved well. The count de Charolois, like a gallant foldier, the king like a great captain, who, though his troops were routed, rallied them in good time, and marched away to Paris.

The count de Charolois marched to Estampes, where War for the he was joined by all the confederates; and the duke of public wood Calabria, amongst his troops, had five hundred Swifs, ended. which were the first ever feen in France y. The confederates had now an army of upwards of one hundred thoufand men, fo that they were clearly ftrong enough to have carried all things at their pleafure, but their weaknefs arole from their ftrength; for their generals were fo numerous, that their army was under no command. The king, who had once thoughts of retiring into Switzerland, or the duchy of Milan, had recourfe to negociation; and, finding that go on flowly, demanded a conference with the count of Charolois. When they met, he cried out, "Brother, am I fafe ?" and, upon his bare affurance that he was fo, rifqued his perfon by putting it in his power 2. He began his discourse with an odd compliment; " I find, fir," faid he, " that you are a prince of my blood, and a man of honour; I received your meffage by the archbifhop; you have kept your word, and that fome months within your time; fo that I shall treat you without fear of being deceived." By the advice of the duke of Milan, who fent his fon with a corps to his affiftance, the king difpatched the treaty as foon as he could; and, by a flroke of his own policy, inflead of one made two. The first at Conflans, with the count of Charolois, dated the 5th of A D.1465. October, and the fecond at St. Maur, with the reft of the confederates, dated the 29th of the fame month *. In thefe the public good was the form, while the fubftance of the treaties tended only to private advantage. The king's bufinefs was to make an end of the war, and to contrive afterwards how to avoid executing a peace, in which he granted to the confederates all they thought fit to defire, and left himfelf as much below the rank of a king, as his paffion for arbitrary power had fet him, while unoppofed, above it.

At the very time of his concluding thefe treaties, Lewis Leavis by protefted, before fome of the officers of the parliament. whom he could truft, against their validity, as being equally contrary to the intereft of the crown and to his intentions. He took care to detach the duke of Bourbon from the league, by owning frankly, that he had fhewn too little regard for him, and promifing to make him amends. He was the ableft and most moderate of the confederates, and therefore the king fludied to gain him b. He next made a treaty at Caen with the duke of Bretagne, who had got poffeffion of fome places in Normandy, which, he forefaw would embarrafs.him with his brother . The king marched into that province with a confiderable army, and, fometimes under one pretence, and fometimes under another, reduced almost all the great towns, fome by fair means, and fome by force, the count de Charolois being, in the mean time, engaged in a war against the people of Dinant. Thefe, during the late war, had made a divertion in favour of Lewis, and being now abandoned by him, and by the people of Liege, were given up to the refentment of the houfe of Burgundy, who pushed it to fo extravagant a length, that they maffacred the inhabitants and deftroyed the city. But, being thus employed, they abandoned the unfortunate Charles, who was forced to fly to the court of the duke of Bretagne, where he was obliged to fell his plate for his fubfiftence; and, being neither duke of Berry nor Normandy, was flyled fimply Monficur, as the king's brother. Lewis, knowing the diffress of the duke of Calabria, which his family were in no condition to relieve. as if he had forgot what was paffed, fent him a large fum of money; but, at the fame time, he punished the count du Maine, who had hitherto maintained a high place in his favour, for having held private intelligence with the confederates<sup>d</sup>. He was very affiduous in executing that part of the late treaty which was leaft thought of, the A.D. 1466; naming a special commission for enquiring into, and redressing grievances ; but he had taken care to make fo ftrict an enquiry into the conduct of fome of the great lords of the league, and their dependents, and to procure fuch clear evidence of whatever he charged them with, that he converted his tribunal into an inquifition against his enemics: thus, long before the end of the next year, the king had freed himfelf from the molt inconvenient claufes of the treaties of Conflans and St. Maur, and was in a fair way of freeing himfelf from the reft, relying not a little on the count of St. Pol, of the imperial house of Luxembourg. on whom, after giving him the conftable's ftaff of France, he had allo beftowed the fifter of his queen in marriage, that he might effectually detach him from the interests of the houfe of Burgundy .

The king, purfuing his own measures, took into his Death of favour many of those he had formerly difgraced; amongst Philip the the reft the lord of Dammartin, whom he had even kept fome time in prifon : what was very wonderful, he affected to treat him and the reft with unufual confidence; employed them in affairs of the greateft importance ; and, by Charles the rewarding them bountifully, really attached fome of them to his fervice f. In like manner he gained the famous earl of Warwick, who had acquired the fingular furname of King-maker: he was at this time upon bad terms with Edward the Fourth, and, coming over to Normandy, Lewis went to meet him, entertained him at Rouen as if he had been a fovereign prince, and fent him back in fuch a disposition, that his country never enjoyed peace till he loft the power of difturbing it, together with his life s. The death of Philip the Good, duke of Burgundy, gave the king no fmall chagrin b. He knew that his fucceffor, Charles the Hardy, hated him; and underftood him better than other man in Europe. He stirred up the people of Liege to renew the war, and, at the fame time, fent the cardinal Balue, and the conftable St. Pol to foothe that prince; and, if that would not do, to try whether, if the king abandoned the Liegois, the duke might not be prevailed upon to give up his ally, the duke of Bretagne. But they mifcarried in both ; the duke defeated the people of Liege, and forced them to fubmit, while the duke of Bretagne, in virtue of a treaty with the duke of Alençon, invaded and made a progrefs in Normandy. This did not hinder Lewis from purfuing his fcheme, which was to enter Picardy with a large army, at the fame time that the admiral, by his orders, invaded Bretagne with one as powerful i. He caufed likewife a review to be made of the citizens of Paris, on whom he affected to rely very much, though in reality he had a meaner opinion of them in their military capacity than they deferved; the whole force of their militia amounted at this time to eighty thousand men, and of these about thirty thousand were in a condition to bear arms. His minister made a fresh attempt to engage the parliament of Paris to approve the king's edict for abolifhing the pragmatic fanction k, but without effect ; and the king, to conciliate the minds of his fubjects, published a declaration, importing that, for the future, he would difpofe of no place, till it became actually vacant by death, refignation, or forfeiture.

In order to pacify the troubles of the flate, and to fecure the affiftance of his fubjects, Lewis called an affembly of the flates at Tours, in which he gave very convincing proofs of his great taleuts for government; he laid before them the confequences that mult inevitably attend the alienation of Normandy, in favour of his brother ; and expressed at The affembthe fame time an earnest defire of executing the late trea- ly of Tours, ties, as far as they tended to the public good ; by which the king declaration he turned that pretence upon his enemies. He turns the pointed out the dangers to which the kingdom was exposed frecious from the ambition of the dukes of Burgundy and Bretagne, phrafe of pressed the ftates to appoint commissioners for redreffing Good on his grievances, and affured them that the best way of making enemies. their court to him was by relieving his people <sup>1</sup>. This behaviour had all the good effects he could defire; the ftates declared the province of, Normandy infeparable from the crown; affured the king of their inviolable duty, and their willingness to support him against all his enemies; and appointed fuch a committee for the redrefs of grievances as he defired m. It is amazing that a prince, who underftood his own intereft fo well; who was fo capable of purfuing them in a right way; and whofe endeavours, when he took this way, were attended with fo much fuccefs, should, notwithstanding, act fo strange a part as he sometimes did, and thereby bring himfelf into greater diffrefs and danger, with greater detriment alfo to his reputation, than even the weakeft of his predeceffors underwent. The fource of this conduct was his want of probity; for right measures can never be taken for wrong ends; and the prince who deceives others, fets a precedent for deceiving himfelf. At this very time he proceeded with great feverity against fome who had stood highest in his favour, and who were not more in fault than those who retained it : as for instance, he had given to Charles de Melun, great mafter of his houfhold, and governor of Paris during the late war, the confifcation of Dammartin's eftates; but, this laft being now in the king's good graces, fet on foot a profecution against Charles de Melun, and being joined in it by cardinal de Balue, the unfortunate Melun was condemned and executed, and Dammartin retrieved his eftates; neither was this the only feverity of the kind "; but we cannot multiply inftances here, becaufe they would rife of themfelves to a volume.

The king having taken thefe precautions, confiding in the excellent intelligence he had, and the fuperiority of his forces, caufed the duke of Bretagne to be attacked with fo much vigour, while he in perfon covered his frontiers against the duke of Burgundy, that the first mentioned duke, perceiving most of the places he had taken in Normandy loft, and that the duke of Calabria, who commanded the king's forces, was equally capable and inclined to puth his conquefts, found it neceffary to treat : having, with fome difficulty, obtained a truce for twelve days, in that space a treaty was concluded at Ancenis °, by which it was flipulated that the king fhould grant his brother an annuity of thirty-fix thousand livres, till a proper appenage should be fettled by the constable and the duke of Calabria; and the king, to make the full use of his superiority, infifted that his brother and the duke fhould notify the conclusion of this treaty to the duke of Burgundy, with whom he was then treating, in hopes that it would influence him; but it produced quite a contrary effect; he gave fo little credit to the news, that he was on the point of hanging the herald P that brought it : and when he was fatisfied that it was true, he began to affemble forces with fuch diligence, that the king to prevent things from coming to extremities, was content to pay him twenty-fix thoufand crowns 9. Dammartin remonstrated to the king, that he had a force fufficient to humble him as he had done the other duke; and that the fhortest way was to attack him before he had affembled his whole ftrength. But cardinal Balue, who held an intelligence with the duke of Burgundy and with the other princes, did not care to fee things decided by the fword : he therefore perfuaded Lewis, that, having fo fuperior a talent in negociation, he should engage the duke to give him an interview, in which it was impoffible he could avoid coming to the king's terms r. This propolition fo flattered the king's vanity, that, though not without fome difficulty, he engaged the duke to name Peronne, in Picardy, for the place of their meeting. Thither accordingly he went, with a few only of his domeftic officers, that the duke, being ftruck by this act of confidence, might be the lefs able to defend himfelf in their conferences<sup>s</sup>. As another means of influencing his refolution, he commanded fome of his ableft emiffaries to enter Liege, and to perfuade the inhabitants to give the duke an alarm. on that fide, on which he had ever found him most apprehenfive. Thus, full of confidence in his own arts, he rushed almost headlong into destruction t, in a manner fcarce excufable in the weakeft prince that ever lived.

The duke received him with all possible marks of regard Throws and refpect, cauled him to be lodged very conveniently in himfelf into the town, and appeared as Lewis expected, highly pleafed the hands with this fignal mark of confidence. While the negociations were going on, prince Philip of Savoy, and fome of the French exiles who had followed the fortunes of prince treats him Charles, came to Peronne, to pay their court to the duke; in the and, being most of them foldiers of fortune, brought Jame manabundance of gens d'arms along with them. The king, being alarmed at their arrival, inftead of quitting the town as he might have done, demanded of the duke to go and refide in the caftle, a request which was very readily granted. He was fcarce well fixed there, before the duke A.D.1468. received intelligence that the people of Liege, by the perfuation of the French emiffaries, had again broke out into an infurrection, furprifed the town of Tongres, made his brother-in-law their bithop prifoner, cut the garrifon to pieces, and murdered fix of his canons ". The duke, in the first transport of his refentment, ordered the castle gates to be fhut, double guards to be posted, and, in short, made the king thoroughly fenfible that he was a prifoner, and at his mercy ". It is impossible to express the difconfolate condition of Lewis, whole apartments were at the very foot of the tower, in which the count of Vermandois had confined Charles the Simple. In this wretched flate he continued three days, but had fo much prefence of mind as to caufe a large fum in ready money, which he had brought with him, to be immediately diffributed amongit the duke's domeflics, with a promife of twice as much This largefs answered his purpose very well; all more. the duke's counfellors ftrove to pacify him; and at length he went to the king and concluded a treaty, or rather prefcribed fuch terms as he thought proper to a prince whofe life and liberty were entirely in his power. Lewis bore all with fignal patience. The duke flipulated that the king's brother should have Champagne and Brie, fixed every thing to his own fatisfaction, and then obliged the king to march with him against Liege, which had revolted at his own requeft *. This was undoubtedly the moft mortifying incident of his whole life, and was very near being the last of

it. The duke of Burgundy was fo much afraid of his making his escape, that he posted a guard of three hundred choice men between his own quarters and those of Lewis to prevent it, in cafe he fhould make any attempt. The inhabitants, guided only by defpair, in the middle of a dark night, made a furious fally, in which, if it had not been for that guard, they would have made themfelves mafters both of the king and duke, and were at laft repulfed with great difficulty. But the place was afterwards carried, partly by furprize, and partly by florm, the king being prefent in the attack. Having thus fulfilled, in every particular, the purpole of his vallal, he had his leave to return ; and the duke had fo much respect for him, as to fuffer him to depart before he fet fire to the town, and maffacred the inhabitants. On his return, Lewis confirmed the treaty in every particular; notified its contents to the proper tribunals; and publithed an edict, forbidding any perfous, under the feverest penalties, from speaking evil of the duke of Burgundy. At the fame time he ordered all the magpyes and javs to be deflioyed, and a note to be brought him of their mafter's names; which odd circumftance was owing to their being taught to cry, Peronne ! Peronne! which the king thought he was in no danger of forgetting, without the help of thefe ridiculous remembrancers y.

The perfidious practices of cardinal Balue and the bilbop of Verdun

At the time the king took leave of the duke of Burgundy, he afked him what was to be done, if his brother thould not be fatisfied with the appenage he had fixed for him in the counties of Champagne and Brie? The duke, who did not penetrate the king's meaning, told him, that he fhould not interfere any more between them ; and that all he dediscovered. fired was that Monfieur should be fatisfied. The king, building upon this declaration, proposed to his brother the duchy of Guienne 2, with fome of the adjacent lordflips, being extremely unwilling to fix his brother in a kind of independent principality, between Flanders and Burgundy, by which he would have had an opportunity, in cafe any new disputes arose, of introducing troops into the very heart of his dominions. But, while he had this and other negociations on his mind, an accident discovered a most dangerous and wicked correspondence, that had been long carried on by his prime minister the cardinal Balue, who had lately merited that title from the court of Rome, by betraving the interefts of the nation, and holding a fecret correspondence with the duke of Burgundy. He, and the bifhop of Verdun, a man of as much fubtlery and intrigue, and whofe morals were as bad as his own, intruffed their letters to the fame man, who being feized for a fpy, and thefe letters found about him, the king had at once a convincing proof that this man, whom, from an obfcure condition, fuitable to the meannefs of his birth, he had raifed, not without violence and injuffice, to the higheft dignities in church and ftate, was laying open his molt fecret counfels, to the prince in the world he had the most reason to dread, and at the fame time pointing out how they might be defeated, and all this merely to render himfelf neceffary, to hold the king, as it were, in toils, and to fecure himfelf a retreat if he fhould lofe his favour.

Both thefe prelates were arrefted, and convicted, partly Both of on proofs, and partly by their own confessions; but the them pucourt of Rome interpoling, the king contented himfelf nifed with with confining both of them in iron cafes of eight fect unprecefquare, the bishop in the Bastile, and the cardinal in feve- verity. ral places, for upwards of eleven years; who was not only the lefs pitied, as he was guilty, but as he was inventor of that cruel kind of cuftody in which he was kept 2. After this period, he found his brother more tractable; infomuch, that he confented to the proposed exchange. In confequence of a kind of reconciliation, they had an interview, where the duke of Guienne made profound fubmiffions to the king, who was fo much perfuaded of his fincerity, that he not only honoured him with the order of St. Michael, which he inftituted about this time, but propofed alfo a marriage between him and the princefs of Caftile, which would have been a fair ftep to the regal dignity b (C). He also affisted his nephew the duke of Calabria,

But this gleam of tranquility, with which the king was highly delighted, did not laft long; for that fpirit of intrigue which he had introduced and encouraged, proved the perpetual fource of foreign and domeftic troubles, during the whole courfe of his reign .

The duke of Burgundy had an only daughter, the great-Allembly of eft heirefs in Europe, and the malecontents in France were nobles at Tours, by defirous that the thould have espoufed Monfieur; it is bewhole adlieved the duke himfelf was not averfe to this match, the wice the confideration of which, induced him to fix the counties of clares war Champagne and Brie, for the appenage of that prince, against the and made him fo much difpleafed at feeing that difpolition altered by the last treaty, which, however, the king had, in fome measure, julified, by the advice he took from the Eurgundy ; duke at his departure from Liege d. Monfieur himfelf alfo had an inclination to this alliance, in preference to that of Spain, which had been negociated for him by his brother. The duke de Bretagne was likewife in this way of thinking, knowing that the king bore always in mind the defire he had of reducing his power, and he difcovered this difpolition by refuling the order of St. Michael, which Lewis had fent him . The affairs of England took a very extraordinary turn; Margaret, queen to Henry the Sixth, again folicited the king's favour and affiftance, having with her the prince of Wales her fon, the famous Earl of Warwick, and the duke of Clarence, brother to Edward the Fourth, who had married the earl's eldeft daughter. Lewis, confidering that the duke of Burgundy had married the fifter

The king thought there A.D.1470. could not be a more favourable opportunity than this to recover the cities and towns in Picardy; but, in all probability, he would not have ventured into an open war with the duke of Burgundy, if he had not been folicited to it by fome of those who had been formerly in close correfpondence with that prince, particularly the conftable de St Pol, and the readinefs expressed by the dukes of Guienne and Bretagne to take arms in his quarrel. He judged it, however, expedient, to give the better colour to this proceeding, that he fhould feem folicited to it by his fubjects, and therefore he called an affembly of the princes and great lords at Tours, where they proceeded with great warmth against the duke of Burgundy; and, upon the complaint of the count d'Eu, ordered him to be fummoned as a peer of France, to anfwer in parliament. It was forefeen he would act as he really did upon this occasion; that is, treat the fummons with contempt, and fend the ufher who brought it to prifon : therefore care was taken that the army fhould be ready to act immediately, with which the constable presently made himself master of St. Quintin, before the duke could well bring an army into the field 3 : what aftonished him more than the loss of the town, was the retreat of his natural brother Baldwin, whom Lewis had found means to corrupt ; and the Flemish writers affert, that a plot was likewife laid for poifoning the dukeh, which, from what the reader will hereafter fee, cannot appear at all improbable.

At the time of the lofs of St. Quintin, the duke of Bur- who, findgundy was at Dourlens, with five hundred horfe, but, as foon as he heard that the people of Amiens had opened their ed, degates to the king, and that Roje and Mondidier had like- mands a wife admitted French troops, he retired to Arras, and be- peace. gan there to affemble forces with great diligence i. duct of those who made it, more especially of the duke of Guienne and the conftable, to whom, therefore, he fent A D.1471. to put them in mind of their old connections. They foon explained the fecret of their new behaviour, by letting him know that he had nothing to do but to give his daughter to the duke of Guienne, and that he fhould foon fee the beft part of the king's troops on his fide. The duke of Bretagne not only ufed the fame language, but added likewife, that the longer he helitated about taking this ftep, the worfe his affairs were like to go, fince the kinghad great intelligence even in the heart of his dominions k. As great politicians as these princes were, they did_not at all foresee the confequences of this manner of acting ; the duke had no conception of fubmitting to the king, much lefs to them. He formed therefore a numerous army, pafied the Somme, and encamped before Amiens, from whence he wrote a very humble letter to the king, defiring a peace, which ended with these words : " If you had known the infide of things, you would not have declared war against me 1." Lewis, who had his reafons also to be weary of this flate of things, and who began to fuspect the loyalty of those who were fondest of the war, concluded a truce for a year, in fpite of all they could fay to prevent it. In the mean time things had again changed their face in England; the duke of Burgundy, rather through intereft than affection, had supplied his brother Edward of England with money and a few fhips, and, as flender as thefe fuccours were, yet, having had always the affection of the people, they enabled him to fucceed; fo that, after having defeated the forces of Henry in two fucceflive battles, he was quietly refeated on the throne ". The duke of Burgundy, in confequence of the truce, altered his language to the French malecontents, though not his fentiments, and feemed to refume the marriage of his daughter, as if he had been more in carneft than ever; nay, he carried the refinement of his policy fo far, that he fent the bifhop of Montauban to Rome to folicit, or to pretend to folicit, a difpenfation. These proceedings were attended with very fingular events ". Lewis was fo much alarmed, that he fent the fieur de Bouchage to his brother, to let him know that he was not ignorant of his intrigues, and that he ought to remember what he had fworn to him on the crofs of St. Lo; implying an imprecation that whoever broke their oaths should die miserably, within a year : he likewise proposed to him the inconveniencies of that match, and the advantages that would attend his adhering ftrictly to his duty. The duke gave the king's minister fair words, and took his own measures; nevertheles, the king heard what his brother had promifed, and is faid to have taken his meafures likewife. Edward the Fourth was no lefs alarmed at this match than Lewis the Eleventh, and ordered his minifters to declare as much to the duke of Burgundy, who, perceiving that Lewis was disposed to negociate upon reafonable term -, turned the truce, at the end of the year, into a peace, which was fixled the peace of Crotoi °. By this. on the restitution of St. Quintin and Amiens, which was ftipulated by the king, the duke abandoned Monficur and the duke of Bretagne to the king's vengeance, and the king left the count de Nevers and the count de St. Pol to the duke's mercy : fuch was the ufage of thefe times.

All possible appearances were in favour of the peace of Death of Crotoi, which the wifest men of those times thought would the duke of have been final. But, on the contrary, this, in the end, Guienne, proved no peace at all; the king, who had fhewn himfelf and the revery fincere through the negociation, refufing abfolutely the to ratify it. The duke of Guienne, who had given the peace with king his brother fuch cruel and fuch constant anxieties, the duke of was dead of a lingering difeafe. It was reported, and be- Burgundy ; lieved in those days, that the chaplain of this prince, who was abbot of St. John d'Angeli, dividing a large and beautiful peach between madame de Monforeau, who was the duke's mistrefs, and the duke, poifoned them both, of which the unfortunate woman died immediately; but the duke, though he languished for half a year, never recovered his colour or ftrength ?. The fieur de Lefcun, who was the duke's favourite, feized the monk, and fent him prifoner to the duke of Bretagne, where it was intended to proceed against him; but he was found, not long afterwards, in the tower, where he was confined, dead of a stroke of thunder, or at least of some stroke or other; which did not at all difpleafe the king 9.

The dake of Burgundy, who continued armed, finding the king refolute in rejecting the peace, declared war, under pretence of revenging his friend the duke of Guienne's death, and committed great cruelties. Yet fome fay the king was not in the wrong. He had infilled, prior to the ratification, that Charles should fend a gentleman with a letter to the dukes of Guienne and Bretagne, to fignify to them that they were no longer to expect his protection. This notice he actually gave; but at the fame time acquainted the duke of Bretagne, by a private letter, that he had no intention to abandon them; that he made this treaty purely to get the towns of St. Quintin and Amiens reftored ; as the king had taken them without any regard to the treaties of Conflans and Peronne, he fhould, when A.D. 1472, he had those places once in his hands, pay-as little regard to the treaty of Crotoi 5. The moment his brother was dead, the king feized the duchy of Guienne, reconquered the county of Armagnac; and, having gained the fieur de Lescun, who had the confidence of the duke of Bretagne, engaged that prince to accommodate matters with him. At the fame time he drew over the famous Philip de Commines, one of the completest courtiers of his time, and the principal minister of the duke of Burgundy: but what his true motive was for quitting the fervice of that prince, he, who was acquainted with fo many fecrets, has thought fit to conceal; and time, which reveals fo many things, has left us in the dark as to this particular.

At the time the king was engaged in Guienne, the duke of Burgundy having failed in retaking the towns upon the Somme, made an irruption into Normandy, but with no concludes a great fuccels. Lewis, upon his return from Guienne, was truce, and inclined to conclude a truce. Several conferences were held, which ended in what the king defired; and, upon this occasion, the duke, who had hitherto concealed it, and probably would have concealed it longer, if he had not been provoked by the conftable's burning his country, contrary to the rules of war, laid open all his treachery to the king, and thereby explained the meaning of that dark paffage in his letter which has been before mentioned t. Lewis was fo much moved at this explanation, that if the constable had been in his power, he would have certainly felt the full weight of his refentment ; but his county and other effates lying between the dominions of the king and duke of Burgundy, his keeping St. Quintin in his hands, and having, during the war, four hundred gens d'arms, though in the king's pay, yet at his devotion, with a confiderable body of troops befides, Lewis always apprehended he would make his peace with the duke of Burgundy, by changing fides; and therefore finding him univerfally odious, began to treat with the duke to concur with him in his vengeance, and to divide his fpoils". Charles, who never forgave him the infolence of prefcribing to him how he fhould difpofe of his only daughter, received the overture favourably enough, but deferred it for the prefent, as being engaged in the expedition of Gueldres, of which country he was heir by the testament of the last prince. He had alfo another and a greater defign in his head, which was to affume the title of king, and to get his territories releafed from the homage due to France and to the empire, in order to unite them in one independent fovereignty, under the title of the realm of Burgundy ". He A.D. 1471. had even a project of extending them by marrying his heirefs to the young duke of Calabria, whole father lived at Barcelona, and who, on the demife of his grandfather. would inherit Lorrain.

The bufinefs of the conflable was brought almost to a The duke of conclusion in the conferences at Bovines, where it was Burgundy agreed he should be delivered up to justice, and that, up- is diverted on his conviction for high treason, his forfeitures should France by be shared between the two princes: but the constable hav- making ing, fome way or other, gained intelligence of what was war in the doing, applied to the king, and made him believe he empare. received his accounts from the duke of Burgundy, who was defirous to attach him entirely to his own fervice. This intimation Lewis believed; and, to difappoint the duke, confented to a conference with the conftable, in which all things, for the prefent, were adjusted; yet, notwithstanding this accommodation, a truce was concluded between the king and the duke for a year *. A man was detected and executed for attempting to bribe one of the king's cooks to poifon him : the fact feems to be true, but even tortures did not force the criminal to discover any perfon of note, and for this reason it was placed to the account of the duke of Burgundy, as the prince who, at this juncture, was most likely to be ferved by it v. The duke of Alençon alfo, whom the king had freely pardoned at the beginning of his reign, was again found plotting to retire to the duke of Burgundy, and to fell him whatever he poffessed in France. been tampering with England, of which intrigue being convicted, he had judgment of death, with a faving to the king's mercy, who again changed the fentence into imprifonment for life 2. The duke of Burgundy was, all this time, embarked in fome difputes in Germany, where he fometimes courted the emperor's favour, and offered his daughter for his fon, as he had done to many other princes; and at other times took fuch fteps as engaged them in a war against each other, as happened in this year A.D. 1474. by his befieging Nuys *. Some of the fhrewdeft perfons in the king's council reprefented this as the most favourable opportunity he could defire for crufhing the duke, by entering into an alliance with the emperor, as to which fome overtures were made, but with very little fincerity; for the king, who commonly followed his own notions, had no opinion of this alliance, but judged it more for his interest to let the duke proceed in his own way, and gradually wafte his force; to facilitate which end, he raifed him up two new enemies, the one Rene duke of Lorrain, grandfon to Rene of Anjou, king of Sicily, and the other the Swifs cantons, with whom Lewis entered into a ftrict and very ufeful alliance. He laid afleep, by the fame arts, his difputes with the king of Arragon, which we have mentioned in another place, and which, this year, had given him a great deal of trouble, and had involved him in various negotiations.

Edward IV. in con-Sequence of feveral alliances with the Duke of Burgundy, invades France.

Next year the king changed his plan of proceeding ; for finding that the duke of Burgundy made difficulties of renewing the truce, he ordered the duke of Bourbon to invade Burgundy, and, at the fame time, caufed him to be attacked on the Somme. He proposed also to the emperor the division of the duke of Burgundy's territories between them; to which propofal that prince answered by the famous apologue of dividing the bear's fkin before they had ftripped him. The obftinacy of the duke of Burgundy got the better of the Germans, who, though they held him befieged in his camp while he befieged Nuys, were, notwithstanding, content to terminate things by a treaty, which, if not advantageous, was at leaft honourable; and now, if his impetuofity would have permitted him, the duke had it in his power either to bring the king to his own terms, or to diffrefs him more feverely than when he

Edward IV. of England, under pretence of revenging the afliftance which Lewis had given to the houfe of Lancaster, but, in reality, that he might obtain a large fupply from the house of commons, and a benevolence from his fubjects, determined to invade France. With this view he had made fix diffine treaties with the duke of Burgundy, who was to affift him in perfon with all his forces, to acknowlege and do him homage as king of France, and to receive from him the duchy of Bar, the counties of Champagne, Nevers, Retel, Eu, and Guife, with other places c. Edward. as foon as he was ready to embark his forces, difpatched a herald to Lewis to fummon him to deliver up the kingdom. The king, who knew how much his actions would be observed on such an occasion, received the herald with an air of gaiety; but taking him into a place that was out of every body's hearing, told him his matter was come upon an idle errand; that his confederates the dukes of Burgundy and Bretagne, and the conflable, would certainly deceive him; and that it would be much better for him to make a peace upon good terms with him, and reftere a thorough harmony between the two crowns, which might be equally beneficial to both nations. The herald feeming to treat this propolition in a manner as if he did not believe it at all impracticable, the king gave him three hundred pieces of gold with great fecrecy, and then ordered Commines to conduct him out of the court ; to take care that he converfed with no body; and, when he difmiffed him, to give him publicly a piece of crimfon velvet, as a teftimony that the king was not displeased with his meffage.

This ended in feveral treaties, which were concluded at Amiens, on the 29th of August; but from their being ratified by the two kings at an interview they had at the bridge of that village. were ftyled the treaties of Pequigni <sup>h</sup>. Inftead of feparate articles, there were five diffinct inftruments : by the first, the two kings confented to leave all their difputes to arbitration, naming the arbitrators; king Edward confented to quit the French territories upon the receipt of twentyfive thousand crowns, without committing any hostilities, and delivered the lord Howard and Sir John Cheyney for hoftages: by the fecond, they concluded a feven years truce for themfelves and allies: the third was a fraternal alliance between the two kings, to be cemented by the marriage of the dauphin with the princefs Elizabeth : the fourth confilled of letters patent, by which Lewis undertook to pay Edward an annuity of fifty thousand crowns, during their lives, which the English writers unanimoufly flyle tribute : and, laftly, Edward agreed to releafe queen Margaret for a ranfom of lifty thousand crowns, to be paid within the fpace of five years, a condition which was punctually executed on both fides 1.

The duke of Burgundy, though much offended with this flep, makes foon after a like treaty.

Lewis received the English lords, knights, gentlemen, and even the foldiers that came to visit the court at Amiens, with a franknefs that furprifed them, ordering tables to be fet in the ftreets with victuals and wine. According to his ufual cuftom, he corrupted the whole English council; and, belides immediate prefents, granted penfions amongst them to the amount of fixteen thousand crowns a year 1. Edward executed his engagements punctually, and delivered the conftable's letters, in which himfelf and king Lewis were very infolently treated. After his return the duke of Burgundy figned, on the 13th A.D. 1475. of September, a truce for nine years; and upon this occafion the king abandoned Rene duke of Lorrain, while the duke gave up the conftable : he alfo concluded a treaty with the duke of Bretagne; hearing that the conftable had quitted St. Quintin, and retired to Mons, he demanded him; and the duke, though with fome reluctancy, gave him up ". He was brought to Paris, tried, and condemned to death by the parliament, which he fuffered on the 10th of December, with great intrepidity and compofure of mind ". The duke of Burgundy had his whole confifeation, which did not balance the reproach of having delivered him to the king.

The king now had leifure and opportunity to concert He runs measure's for the duke of Burgundy's destruction, which it is probable he might have done without regard to the ima war, truce; but perceiving that the duke himfelf was fufficient - by which ly bent upon his 'own ruin, he very prudently gave him his treano difturbance, but left him to push his rash enterprizes Jures ave in what manner he thought fit; and, without queftion, and has he could not have taken a furer method. Lewis, in the mean time, profecuted his uncle the old unfortunate king of Naples, for holding a correfpondence with the duke of Burgundy and his enemies, and forced him to an abject fubmiffion. He declined giving any affiftance to Don Alonfo of Portugal, who came in perfon to demand it ; he constrained the duke of Bretagne to renounce all his engagements with the duke of Burgundy; and, taking advantage of the declining flate of that prince's affairs, punished the infidelity of feveral of his own fubjects, and obliged most of his neighbours to compensate past neglects, by entering into such engagements as he thought fit to dictate; for he was now in the zenith of his power, and gave law at his pleafure both at A.D.1476. home and abroad P. The duke of Burgundy, in an unaccountable fit of violence, had feized the duchefs of Savoy, the king's fifter, with whom, though Lewis had never lived with her on good terms, he now entered into an amicable correspondence, and, by his interpolition, procured her liberty; for, though the duke ftill hated him as much as ever, infomuch that he broke an interview concerted between them, yet his circumftances did not allow him to give the king fo fair an opportunity of breaking the truce, and anticipating that deftruction to which his affairs were haftening, by his own precipitate conduct, and contempt even of the king's admonition 9.

The defeat and death of the duke gives Lewis an to feize Burgundy.

Amongst the foldiers of fortune in the duke of Burgundy's army, with which he belieged Nancy, was the count de Campobaffo : he commanded a corps of Italians, and, in revenge of a blow given him by that prince, had opportunity long entertained a defign of compassing his destruction. He offered his fervice on every fide, and amongit the reft to Lewis, who, from generofity or policy, gave the duke notice of it; but he was fo far from making a right use of it, that he confided in him more than ever. This man betrayed him in all fhapes; protracted the fiege of Nancy; corresponded with the enemy; and, upon the approach of the duke of Lorrain with an army of fourteen thousand men, raifed chiefly with the king's money, deferted him, and retired to a post, where, if the army should be defeated, he might cut off their retreat. He left behind him fome officers who were embarked in the confpiracy, who, as foon as the battle began, on Sunday lanuary the 5th, gave way, and threw the army into diforder; others, posted about his person, dispatched the duke, in the heat of the engagement, and threw his body into a ditch; after which incident all was flaughter and confusion r. Lewis no fooner received the news than he difpofed every thing to turn this event as much as poffible to his own advantage (D). He gave out that he intended to marry the young duchefs of Burgundy, who was in the twenty-first year of her age, to the dauphin, who was just entered the feventh. He feized Burgundy and the county of Artois, and raifed fuch diffurbances in Flanders, that the people put to death their young miftrefs's moft faithful counfellors, on account of letters which the king put into their hands. He made use of the prince of Orange for fome time, and then threw him off; he found means to hinder the king of England from interfering in favour of the houfe of Burgundy'. At length he fuffered the marriage of Maximilian of Auftria with that rich heirefs to take place, rather than that of the count d'Angoulefme, as being more afraid of a prince of his own blood than of

(D) The king was exceffively uneafy about the iffue of this campaign. He had a cuftom of giving magnificent prefents to fuch as brought him good news; Commines and Bouchage had received each of them two hundred marks for bringing him an account of the duke's former defeats. Du Lude fat up all night, in order to watch for the courier, who came about break of day, with the news of this fatal defeat of Nancy, but he could fay nothing particular as to the duke's death. The king, however, was fo overjoyed, that he told the news to all the great men at court, and invited them to dine with him. In the life of Angelo Cotta, archbifhop of Vienne, at whofe request Philip de Commines wrote his memoirs, it is faid that Lewis was hearing mafs in the cathedral of St. Martin at Tours, at the very inftant the battle of Nancy was fought; and that, when this prelate. according to cuftom, prefented the pix for the king to kifs, he faid, " Sire, God gives you peace and repofe, you may enjoy them if you pleafe, quia confummatum eft: your enemy, the duke of Burgundy, is at this instant flain, and his army entirely overthrown." Bur, if we confider that this is told us by an anonymous writer, and that there is not the least mention of it in Commines, or any other historian of credit, we can scarce yield our affent.

a ftranger t. This year was also fatal to James d'Armagnac, duke of Nemours, whom the king had caufed to be arrefted, and convicted of high treason. He was a man fo covered with crimes, that he died unpitied; and yet his conviction was brought about in fo indecent a manner, and his death was accompanied with fuch circumftances of feverity, as drew great imputations of cruelty upon Lewis. He was brought on horfeback to a fcaffold, where he was beheaded, and his blood, running through, fell upon his children, which was fuch a ftrain of barbarity, as never had been heard of before ". He diftributed his confifcations amongst his creatures, many of whom were low people, particularly Oliver le Dain, who had A.D. 1477. been his barber ; and published an edict, requiring all perfons who had the most distant knowlege of treasons to reyeal them, on pain of being treated as accomplices : a law that, after remaining long dormant, was awakened, to gratify the refentment of cardinal Richlieu, in the reign of Lewis the Thirteenth.

> Hoftilities having again commenced between the king and the archduke Maximilian, who could not bear to fee a great part of his wife's dominions torn from her by a prince, whom he thought of all princes the most unjust, laboured all he could to recover them out of the king's hands; and the prince of Orange having quitted his fervice, became a powerful inftrument in the hands of the archduke, till fuch time as the king fent the fieur de Chaumont to command in Burgundy, who very fpeedily reduced the far greatest part of it, and even the city of Befancon, which was then effeemed an imperial town ". Upon this lofs, the archduke altered his meafures, and was disposed to conclude a truce, that he might have some degree of leifure to fettle himfelf in his new dominions, and to acquire a thorough knowlege of their force. Lewis had precifely the very fame reafons, with regard to his conquests, both in Artois and Burgundy, fo that a truce was concluded for a year at Arras *. The king then made a journey into Touraine, under colour of a religious pilgrimage, which was frequent enough with him, when he had a mind to vifit this or that part of his dominions, for political purpofes. He had then a multitude of negociations upon his hands, and he managed them all with great dexterity. His fifter, the duchefs of Savoy, was dead; he provided for the fafety of her family, and the fecurity of their dominions. He took the family of Medicis under his protection, and fent Commines into Italy, to treat with pope Sixtus the Fourth, who was the capital enemy of that house. He difmiffed Don Alonfo of Portugal, who had been long foliciting fuccours, and told him plainly, that his interest made it requisite for him to acknowlege Don Ferdinand and Donna Ifabella, with whom it was in vain any longer to difpute. He made an alliance with them accordingly, which was very convenient for his affairs, as it hindered them from entering into alliance with the emperor and his fon the archduke; and he continued to feed the king of England and his ministers with fums of money, which while they confumed in the pleafures of a luxurious court, he was left to purfue his projects at leifure, notwithitanding the indefatigable endeavours of the duchefs-dowager of Burgundy, and of the duke of Bretagne, to excite the ambition or the jealoufy of Edward, and thereby engage him to revive the old pretenfions of his family to the crown of France, or at least to the duchies of Normandy and Guienne y.

The new treaty, which had been fo long negociating A D 1478. in England, was at length concluded and figned in the month of February, and feems to have confifted of two parts. By the first Lewis stipulates for himself and fucceffors, that they shall continue to pay the pension of fifty king of thousand livres to the king during his life, and to his heirs England. and fucceffors for one hundred years to come. The fecond, of the fame date, was for prolonging the truce, friendship, and good understanding, between the two kings during their lives, and between their fucceffors for the space of one hundred years, with promife of mutual affiftance against their rebellious subjects. The other articles imported, that, if one of the two princes were driven out of his kingdom, the other flould be obliged to receive, and affift him with all his forces; that they fould make no alliance without a mutual confent; that the king of France should ratify this treaty, and cause it to be confirmed and ratified by the states; and that Edward should likewife procure the parliament's approbation. The archduke, before the end of the truce, had begun 1.D.1479. hostilities again in Burgundy, and in the Low Countries. In the month of August he laid fiege, with a numerous army, to Terouane; the fieur d'Efguerdes, who commanded in Picardy, marched to the relief of the place, n the Low with an army ftronger in horfe, but weaker in infantry. than that of the Flemings : the archduke raifed the fiege, in order to give him battle *. The French cavalry charged with great impetuofity, and foon defeated the archduke's nherits the horfe, upon which the French infantry fell to pillaging ; acceffion of but the archduke difmounting, with fome lords that were he house of about him, and putting himfelf at the head of the Flemish foot, attacked the French, already in diforder, and defeated them. On the whole, however, neither party had any great reason to boast of their success in the battle of Guinegate b. . The archduke feems to have loft moft, from his not returning to the fiege: it is true he took a small cafile afterwards, put the remains of the garrifon to the fword, and, three days after, hanged the officer who commanded in it. Lewis was fo much incenfed at this cruelty, that he ordered fifty of the principal prifoners, taken in the beginning of the battle, to be hanged in different places; amongst these was a fou of the king of Poland, who ferved as a volunteer in the Flemish army, and for whom a reprieve came, just as he was going to die c. The king gained a greater advantage at fea; for one Coulon, a privateer of Normandy, with fome of his affociates, took fourfcore fail of Flemish ships in the northern feas; which blow affected the inhabitants of the Low Countries fo much, that they carried on the war but very languidly the next fummer, and, towards the end of A.D.1480. it, concluded a truce d. Pope Sixtus, being very defirous of putting an end to this war, fent the cardinal de la Rovene, to perfuade both the king and the archduke to leave their differences to his mediation; in which aim, though he did not altogether fucceed, yet he had no reason to repent his coming into France; for, befides renewing the truce for another year, he prevailed upon Lewis to fet car-

The king was fo little fatisfied with the behaviour of the militia called franc-archers at the laft battle, that he refolved to employ them no more. Thefe men were raifed and paid by the villages. In their ftead, the king brought in Swifs troops, whom he hired, and added to them ten thoufand French foot, to whom he gave regular pay. Charles du Maine, count of Provence, the laft of the houfe of Anjou, dying without iffue, left his eflates to the king <sup>f</sup>.

In the beginning of the fucceeding year, Lewis had an Death of attack of an apoplexy, which is, with great probability, the ducheis afcribed to his indefatigable application to bufinefs. As dy, the daufoon as he was a little recovered, he went into Normandy, phin conand caufed a ftrong camp to be formed there of the new tracted to troops, for his diversion; that he might examine at lei- her daughfure many things that regarded military affairs with his ter, and the own eyes, and be, for the future, lefs liable to imposi-ward iv. tions . He removed from thence to Tours, where he had another stroke of an apoplexy, but lefs violent. He fhewed that his parts were ftill found, by his prudent management of the affairs of Savoy, where he did many things for the interest of the young prince Philibert, his nephew, by playing the great men in the country one against another, by which finesse he limited the power of all. In the fpring of the fucceeding year, the duke, who A.D. 1481. was about seventeen, came to meet him at Grenoble, and went with him from thence to Lyons, where, being feized with a fever, he died, His brethren Charles and John. being educated in France, the king declared himfelf tutor to the former, and fent him to take poffeffion of his dominions<sup>b</sup>. It was there he received an account of the death of the duchefs of Burgundy, by a fall from her horfe, which is faid to have given him new fpirits<sup>1</sup>. He had been for fome time carrying on an underhand negociation with the people of Ghent, which he managed with fo much addrefs, that by their affiftance he compelled the archduke to confent to the marriage of his daughter Margaret with the dauphin, which treaty was figned on the 23d of December: the news of this had fuch an effect on Edward the Fourth of England, that he determined to break with Lewis as a falfe and perfidious prince k; but, before he was able to express his refertment otherwise than by words, an apoplexy, or fome other fudden difeafe, removed him out of the world, and delivered Lewis from the laft enemy that he had to fear. A circumstance highly favourable to him, as it left the house of Burgundy totally without refource.

Lewis retires to his palace of Plefis near Tours, in a low and languifbing condition.

It may be truly faid, that Lewis only wanted health to taite the pleafure of feeing his affairs in a much better fituation than they had ever been in during his reign. At home he had gradually increafed his power at the expence of the nobility, and he could not well make a worfe ufe of it than fome of them did 1. Abroad he had nothing to fear. Ferdinand and Ifabella were very defirous of cultivating that friendship which he professed for them; and though he ftill held Roufillon and Cerdagne, he had nothing to fear from them as possesfors of Arragon, the crown of Navarre being under his protection. The king of Portugal was his ally, and had an intereft in being fo. If he was not effected, he was at leaft refpected in Italy, where they were as little in a condition to deceive as to difturb him. In England fresh difturbances broke out on the death of king Edward. The power of the archduke was much circumfcribed, and his force not a little broken by the king's conquefts. He had many allies in the empire; and the Swifs were as much bound to his interefts, and ferved him much more cordially than if they had been his fubjects m. As a monarch, he might be truly faid to have gained his ends, and to have been fuccefsful in his politics: let us fee what refulted from it with regard to himfelf. He retired to his country palace at Pleffis, near Tours, which was walled and guarded, not as a fortrefs but as a prifon, to which his jealous humour confined him, and there he tormented himfelf as much as he had tormented others ". Few of the princes of the blood and great lords had accels to him; and, when they had, they entered fingly, with fcarce any attendance. His ftrength decayed daily, death flared him in the face, and he never appeared more dreadful to the meaneft malefactor. As he had diffembled other fears, he took every method to conceal this; he wore gay apparel, he had concerts of

He ordered reliques to be brought him from all parts, and fent for Francis de Pauli, a reputed faint, out of Calabria, to pray for him. He had ambaffadors in every court of Europe, who were continually entering upon new negociations; fpies to manage private intrigues; and merchants to buy horfes, dogs, rich furniture, and curiofities, purely to difcredit the rumours of his weak and dying condition P.

His fon, the dauphin, was bred up at Amboife, under A.D. 1482. the care of Peter de Bourbon, count of Beaujeu, with equal feverity and privacy. He was at this time turned of His death thirteen, and the king had fcarce fcen him for feveral and chayears. He conjured him to make ufe of those whose capacity and fidelity he recommended from experience; to love peace, and to live upon good terms with his neighbours; and laftly, to treat his fubjects with juffice and lenity 9. He fuffered a third ftroke of an apoplexy which he furvived juft a week. As foon as he recovered his fenfes a little, he ordered the chancellor to carry the feal to his fon, whom from this time he called the king; he grew more composed and refigned, and gave fome marks of computction for those actions which difhonoured his reign, and will render his memory odious '. He expired on the 30th of August, in the fixty-first year of his age, and twenty third of his vreign. He united to the crown of Burgundy by force of arms, Anjou, Maine, Bar, and Provence, as heir to Charles count du Maine ; the best part of the county of Artois, and some great towns in Picardy, were the fpoils of the house of Burgundy; the counties of Roufillon and Cerdague under pretence of a mortgage; and the county of Boulogne by

He was contracted at five years old to the princefs Margaret of Scotland, whom he efpoufed at Tours on the 25th of June, 1436. About three years after, he first openly departed from his duty to his father; but he had been an ill hufband almost from the time he was married. He married next Charlotte, daughter to Lewis duke of Savoy, for the fake of money, and when the was a child : he had never feen her, when he retired into Burgundy. He fent for her thither, and had a fon, Joachim, born at Genep near Bruffels. This prince died young, at which event, his father was fo much afflicted, that he made a vow to have no commerce with any other woman than his wife, which he is faid to have kept. He had by his queen, Charles, who fucceeded him; Francis duke of Berry, who died under a year old; Louifa, who died young; Anne, who married Peter, lord of Beaujeu, who became afterwards duke of Bourbon. She was a princefs of a high fpirit and fine parts, governed France with great fuccefs and prudence, during the minority of her brother; but is faid to have had an inclination for Lewisduke of Orleans, which turned afterwards to a mortal hatred, that proved highly detrimental to the kingdom. The voungest of his children was Joan, who married the duke of Orleans, and was divorced from him after he became king. As for the queen Charlotte of Savoy, after enduring the contempt, the humours, outrages, and infidelities of her hufband all his life, and being condemned by him to exile on his deathbed, fhe did not live long enough to difcern how her daughter would diftinguish between the unjust command of a dving king, and the duty fhe owed to a good and pious mother, dying at Amboife, the place of her banishment, December the 1st, 1483, when but thirty-eight years of age. Befides these Lewis had feveral natural children by different mothers. He directed, in the most explicit manner, that his corpfe thould be interred at Our Lady of Cleri, for whom, as we have heard from Brantome, he had a very high veneration. A ftately tomb was crected there to his memory, which was deftroyed by the Hugonots, in 1562, who caufed the remains of his body to be burnt, and the afhes to be fcattered in the air (1).

Charles VIII. in whom ended the direct Line of Philip de Valais.

THE new king Charles the Eighth was in law of age, Accefion of as having entered his fourteenth year, but in reality a minor, having been bred up amongst the low and inferior people about the court, not only without the advantages ment feof learning, but of inftructions of any kind, even those of eured to the conversation. This circumstance may feem to reflect on dame de Peter de Bourbon, and the dame de Beaujeu, fo the French hiltorians call her, and fo shall we for the future, more especially fince the was his fifter. But in reality, his father only was in fault; for it was in obedience to his orders that he was thus educated, or rather, had no education t. The young king was, befides, deformed in his body, very infirm in his health; and, except in the vivacity of his eyes, had nothing princely or majeftic about him. It was abfolutely necefiary that fomebody fhould affift him in holding the reins of government, though the law would not permit that perfon to bear the ftyle of regent ". The great difficulty was to fettle who this perfon should be. The deceased monarch, who was certainly the beft judge, had named his daughter Anne of France, dame de Beaujeu, and not her hufband, though he intended he fhould have an equal fhare of the government, becaufe he forefaw that the princes of the blood, nearer the throne. might endeavour to disposses him ; whereas the dame de Beaujeu, being the king's fifter, exempted her from any difputes of that kind, at least in his opinion *. But the laft honours were hardly paid to Lewis, before two princes of the blood formed pretentions to the administration; thefe were Lewis, duke of Orleans, active, adable, and amiable in all respects, but not above twenty-three years of age; and the duke of Bourbon, elder brother to the lord of Beaujeu, a prudent, grave, and much effecmed prince, of fixty years of age. The dame de Beaujeu forefaw the diforders this competition might occasion, and therefore proposed an expedient that could not be rejected, that of leaving this point to be fettled by an affembly of the flates. In the mean time all parties agreed to deliver up, if not the most criminal, at least the most odious, of the late king's ministers to the public refentment. Thefe were Oliver le Daim, count of Meulan, once the king's barber, and at the time of his death his great confident; and John Doiac, who had been alfo an inftrument of vengeance and oppreffion; the former was hanged for adultery and murder; the latter was foourged through the ftreets of Paris, and then had his right ear cut off, afterwards transferred into Auvergne, of which province he had been governor, and, at the village of Monferrand, the place of his nativity, he was foourged again, and loft his left ear : but he kept his wealth, becaufe it could not be discovered. James Coctier, or Cottier, Lewis's infolent phyfician, paid a large fine as a imall atonement for his manifold offences, and was fuffered to poffels his immense fortune in obscurity v.

The flates affembled at Tours fettle the administration, and give the king a large ubfidy.

The duke of Bretagne, who was entirely governed by his minister Peter Landais, was now much declined through age, which infpired the prince of Orange and marshal Rieux with the defign of feizing, and perhaps of putting to death Landais, that they might govern in his room. But they miffed their blow; for though the minister was hated, the duke was beloved, and they were constrained to retire out of Bretagne 2. Peter Landais found it neceffary to have recourfe to France for Support. He first folicited the dame de Beaujeu without effect; he then turned his eyes upon the duke of Orleans, who, upon his invitation, made a tour into Bretagne, accompanied by John count of Dunois and Longueville, the fon of that great captain who had fo effectually ferved the king's grandfather, and who was himfelf a perfon of great merit and abilities. He it was who infpired the duke with the thoughts of marrying Anne, fole daughter and heirefs of the duke of Bretagne. When he came to fee her, inclination supplanted interest, fo much that he became her paffionate admirer a. The court took umbrage at the duke's retreat, and fummoned him to attend the affembly of the ftates at Tours ; to which, not without difficulty, the count of Dunois engaged him to repair. When he went thither he found that the dame de Beaujeu had been much too hard for him. She faw, that if any of the two parties joined against the third, they must prevail. She had already made fome overtures to the duke, to no purpofe; fhe then turned her eyes to the duke of Bourbon, knowing that the conftable's fword was the great object of his ambition ; and, therefore, the infinuated to him, that if he prevailed in obtaining the direction of affairs, he could not, with any decency, affume it of himfelf; but in joining his party to her's, he might obtain it with honour b. This compromife difappointed the duke of Orleans; her authority was confirmed by the ftates, in conjunction with a council, which they named; and every thing having paffed with the utmost regularity, the states broke up, after giving the king two millions and a half, with an additional prefent of three hundred thousand livres for the expences of his coronation. So that the face of public affairs was entirely changed for the better, through the fagacity of this wife princefs c.

The coronation was folemnized with all proper magnifi- An infurcence, about nine months after the king's accession. The rection duke of Orleans, finding nothing was to be done by intrigues, betook himfelf to arms, and many of the nobility Orleans, and princes of the blood, particularly Rene duke of Alen- quelled by con, who with his father's title inherited too much of his the prutemper, and the duke of Bourbon, adhered to him. His denie of the chief dependence, however, was upon the duke of Bretagne, and he, or rather his minifter, was as well difpofed in his behalf as he could defire d. The dame de Beaujeu suspected this disposition, and, which was more, found that the king himfelf was inclined to him. She managed things, however, with fo much dexterity, as fecured her fuccefs. She fent a perfon of a bold enterprifing difpolition to the duke of Bretagne, in the name of the duke of Orleans, to defire he would not march his troops into France till he demanded them, and thus difconcerted the duke of Orleans, who could not act for want of them; and removing at once from the king's perfon all who were in the interest of the duke, she put an escape out of his power, to which he was otherwife inclined . The duke A.D. 1484. of Orleans went to Paris, and endeavoured to gain the parliament, but failed ; neither had he any greater fuccels in his endeavour to feize Orleans, upon which difappointment he was obliged to make the beft terms he could with the court; the hardeft of which was, the banifhment of the count of Dunois, who generously advised him to confent to it, as a thing neceffary to his intereft f. Peter Landais having first supported, intended afterwards to have fold the earl of Richmond to king Richard the Third of England; but the earl, having had timely notice, efcaped, took refuge in France, and was enabled by the court to make that expedition which feated him on the English throne, by the title of Henry the Seventh s.

The confequences of those maxims which had prevailed in the late reign, were the fources of that fraud, violence. and difloyalty, which diftreffed the prefent. The governefs, except her hufband, had nobody to depend upon, farther than as the gratified them. Rene, duke of Lorrain, was amongh the first and the loudest of the malecontents. His pretentions ran very high, for he claimed no less than the whole fuccession of the house of Anjou. He was reftored to the duchy of Bar, had a good penfion given him, and a promife that his claim to the duchy of Provence should be examined and decided in four years h. This gratification brought him fo thoroughly into the interefts of the court, that before the war broke out, when the duke of Orleans gave the dame de Beaujeu the lie at the council table, the duke of Lorrain ftruck him on the face i. By his advice chiefly the war had been managed, and to this circumftance, in a great meafure, was owing its fuccefs. Yet it was hardly over, before he grew out of humour again, and the conftable de Bourbon was exactly in the fame difpolition; that is to fay, after he had received what he afked he thought it too little, and began to look A D.1485. for fomething more. This conduct in the great, had an influence alfo upon perfons of lefs confideration, who valued their fervices very high, and, if not paid to their with forgot former favours, and even their duty k. The dame de Beaujeu knew all this, but feemed to know inothing. The duke of Orleans was about the court, and, in appearance, eafy and quiet. The truce with Henry the Seventh of England was ratified, and the intrigues in the Low Countries, of which the late king had made fo good ufe, were still kept on foot, and answered the purposes of his daughter in the like manner. In a word, there was a general appearance of tranquility, but nothing like it at bottom, all parties were contriving to revive the difturbbances fo lately fupprefied, and it was not long before the fmothered fire broke out.

In Bretagne the enemies of the minister brought their defigns to bear, and put Peter Landais to an infamous death, in fpite of the duke, who at length fuffered himfelf to be governed by the fieur de Lefeun and the prince of and planges Orange, who were in a close correspondence with the the kingcourt of France, not only till they thought it their inter- dom into d eft to enter into the measures of the malecontents', but aviland even afterwards pretending to difcover those contrivances, auar, in which they had as deep a concern as any; but the true value of their difcoveries was well underftood at court, and they only amufed themfelves, while they thought they were amufing others 1. The duke of Orleans, when he had formed a new league, and had recalled the count of Dunois into France, retired into Bretagne, not doubting that he flould now accomplifh with eafe those fchemes in which he had been baffled before. The archduke, Maximilian, was actually in arms; the duke of Lorrain had entered into the league; the duke of Bourbon, the count d'Angoulesme, and several other great lords, were actually engaged; and they had, in appearance, the whole force of Bretagne at their command ". It quickly appear- A.D. 1486. ed, however, that these fignals of fuccess were but fallacious. The king fell with an army into Guienne, and ftripped many of the malecontents of their employments and their effates. The count of Angoulefme went to pay his respects to the king at Bourges, and fubmitted. The court taking fome fteps as if they had intended the reftitution of Provence, the duke of Lorrain from being violent became neuter. The duke of Bourbon being convinced by his brother that he was not only acting against his duty. but the interest of his house, in adhering to the malecontents, quitted them ". The king marching his forces into Anjou, the nobility of Bretagne were alarmed, and a great part of them entered into a fecret treaty with the court of France, to prevent their country from becoming the feat of war. Maximilian, become king of the Romans, made an irruption into the French territories with no great advantage, the king marching against him with a powerful army, while the troubles in Bretagne hindered the malecontents from taking any advantage of his abfence °. court was now fo fecure of the duke of Bourbon, that with his confent they arrefted two of his friends, the lord Culant, and the famous Philip de Commines, who being convicted by his own letters of having held a correspondence with the duke of Orleans, was obliged to pass eight months in one of those iron cages which were of the late king's crection P.

The king invades Bretagne and brings the duke 'nto great danger and diftrefs.

The lord of Albret was of the number of those who had figned the league, and he had a confiderable force at his command; but he was in his own domains, which lay at fo great a diftance, and had fo many provinces to traverse, that it feemed unreasonable, even to the malecontents, to prefs him 9. Their own neceffities, however, filenced all fcruples; and, that he might raife none, they made him believe that he fhould marry the duke's eldeft daughter upon his arrival; for the duke of Bretagne was now in the fame circumstances that the duke of Burgundy had been in; that is, he placed all his dependence in an army of fons-in-law. But the duke of Orleans and the prince of Orange, who made these overtures to Albret, were most culpable ; for the former, though married to the late king Lewis's daughter, aimed at this match for himfelf; and the prince was fecretly negociating for the king of the Romans . The lord of Albret was fo much ftruck with this proposal, that he not only undertook to march in fpite of all the obflacles that lay in his way, but alfo to bring over the corps which he had in the king's army, and actually in his pay. While he was labouring this point, Charles VIII. advanced, in the month of May, into Bretagne, and fuppofing that the neceffity of his affairs releated him from the letter of the treaty he had made with the lords of Bretagne, inftead of an army of four hundred lances, and four thousand infantry, as had been ftipulated, he entered with three, or, fome fay, four bodies of troops, each of them A.D.1487. of greater ftrength . The first took Ploermell, the fecond Vannes, out of which the old duke, Francis II: luckily made his efcape; for though he had at first an army of eighteen thousand good troops, yet the best part of them were taken from him by an artifice; for Maurice du Menez, a Breton by birth, who had been formerly in the fervice of France, gave out that the quarrel between the princes and the king was a farce concerted between them; and that the French in the duke's army meant to deliver him up to their mafter. Upon hearing this tale, threefourths of the army deferted. The third army reduced Dinant; and the fourth, which was indeed composed by the conjunction of the other three, befieged Nantes. The duke, in this diffrefs, fent the count Dunois to folicit relief from king Henry of England ; but being three or four times put back by contrary winds, he was fo alarmed at the danger of the duke and of the princes with him, that he railed the militia of Lower Bretague, to the number of fixty thousand men, and conducted his affairs fo ably, that he first relieved the city, and afterwards obliged the French to raife the fiege. The king, notwithstanding, put his troops into winter-quarters in Bretagne. He had the like fuccefs in Guienne, where the lord of Albret was forced to difarm and fubmit; and in Picardy, where the troops of the king of the Romans were defeated, and the town of St. Omer's taken. The lords of Bretagne, who had closed with France, feeing the danger that the duke and his dominions were in, reconciled themfelves to their fovereign, and at the fame time began a pretended negociation with the dame de Beaujeu, who faw through it, and cheated them who intended to cheat her; for being aware of their real intentions, fhe gave them fuch anfwers as mifled them extremely.

The necessary preparations were made for opening the The French campaign very early, when the plenipotentiaries imagined gain the the court, upon their fallacious propositions, would have visitory of opened conferences : finding their miltake, the count de Comminges, who was at the head of the embaffy, took the duke of his leave, and marfhal Rieux, who had attended the king Orleans on behalf of the lords of his party in Bretagne, withdrew and prince privately, put himfelf at the head of the troops of his old of Orange maller, and recovered feveral places that had been taken prilaters. by the French. The lord of Albret alfo, whom the king had pardoned, arrived in Bretagne by fea, and brought with him four thousand men. His company of gens d' arms, alfo in the king's army, revolted, and joined them. But these little fuccesses were much qualified by other events: the king's troops under la Trimouille were in the field before they expected them, and the duke of Orleans, the counts of Dunois and Comminges, Philip de Commines, and feveral others, were cited to appear before the parliament; by which meafure it was evident the king intended to treat them as rebels. The French army began with the fiege of Fougeres, a very ftrong place, well provided, with a good garrifon, which it was imagined would make a long defence ; but the French artillery reduced it in a week. This lofs was followed by that of the fortrefs of St. Aubin du Cormier, upon which the Bretons and the malecontents took a refolution to fight. This decifive engagement happened on Monday, the 28th of July. The first line was commanded by the marshal de Rieux and the lord of Albret; in the fecond there was a fmall corps under the command of lord Scales, with twelve hundred Bretons under the red crofs of St. George, that they might be taken for English. There was also a body of German auxiliaries fent to the king of the Romans. As the whole army had entertained great jealoufy of them, the prince of Orange put himfelf at the head of the Breton infantry, and the duke of Orleans acted at the head of the Germans, both on foot. The armies were very near equal, each about twelve thousand firong t. The French were fuperior in horfe; and the Breton cavalry behaved ill; their foot fought gallantly, till, being attacked in flank and rear, they were broke; five thousand five hundred men were killed on the fpot; the duke of Orleans and the prince of Orange were taken; and the victory was as complete in all respects as could be defired ". The two princes were carried to St. Aubin, where the general La Tremouille invited them to supper, which passed very well, but had an untoward defert; for just as it was over, came in two Cordeliers, who told the general, that, according to his orders, they were come to confeis the prifoners. The duke and the prince looked upon each other, fupposing they had not long to live. The general relieved them, by faying, that he fhould expect the orders of the court in regard to them; but that he had, by his own authority, ordered fome gentlemen, who were taken in arms against the king, to be beheaded ". The duke of Bretagne was fo humbled by this defeat, that he was forced to have recourse to fubmiffion, and to make fuch a treaty as the king was pleafed to admit, which was concluded on the 28th of August, at Sable ; and, on the oth of September, this unfortunate prince died of a fall from his horfe, leaving his two daughters, Anne and Ifabel, to the care of the marshal de Rieux and the count de Comminges, by his will, charging them to be guided by the advice of the count

A civil war had broke out in the Low Coun- A.D. 1488. tries, in which the people of Ghent, by the allistance of the French, had taken the king of the Romans prifoner, and did not release him, but upon hard terms, and in confideration of a high ranfon. The duke of Bourbon being dead, his brother, the lord of Beaujeu, fucceeded to that title; and, therefore, for the future we are to flyle his confort duchefs of Bourbon.

The affairs of Bretagne were now in fuch confusion, Henry VII. that there was no way left to preferve the whole country interpoles, from being conquered, but to apply to Henry the Seventh purpole, in of England. He was indeed deeply interested in the pre- the affairs fervation of that important fovereignty; but his politics of Brewere fo refined, that he did not fee the full extent of its highe. danger. The people of England did, and how much it imported them to fave it; and, therefore, they forced the king to conclude a treaty with the young duchefs, and to fend over fix thousand men to her affistance *. But the main point of all was the marriage. Her father had made very ftrong promifes to the lord of Albret, who commanded at Nantes with a great corps of troops, and the marshal Rieux, who took upon him to act as her guardian, was, in earnest, defirous that it should take place. The chancellor of Bretagne, who was against it, had her confidence; and, befides the princels, who was but in her thirtcenth year, had the utmost repugnance to a marriage with a man of forty-five, of a very indifferent perfon, hafty in his temper, whole effates were not very confiderable, and who had three fons and four daughters by a for- A.D.1489. mer wife y. This was not all, the father had likewife, from a principle before mentioned, concluded with the prince of Orange a marriage for his daughter with Maximilian, king of the Romans, in whole interest the chancellor was. There was a great difproportion in their age. but the king had a good perfon, and was reported to be of an eafy temper; but withal he was very indolent, and his finances were in great diforder: king Charles was looked upon as his fon-in-law, the princefs Margaret being bred up in France, agreeable to the treaty concluded with the king his father, and it was upon this that Henry of England chiefly depended *. Charles encouraged thefe notions, when, after treating with Maximilian at Francfort, he offered to fubmit to him the difputes in Bretagne, provided the duchefs would do the like: thus a kind of treaty of pacification was concluded, by which the English were obliged to return, and the king to reftore the greateft part of his conquefts. All parties feemed pleafed with this treaty, which none of them intended to keep, becaufe it kept things quiet for the prefent, and gained time, which they all of them wanted *. Each conceived that his view was a fecret to the other party, and took his measures. while the calm lafted, for the ftorm which was to enfue.

Charles, by the advice of the duke and duchefs of Bourbon, releafed John de Chalons, prince of Orange, and fent him back into Bretagne, where he had a great intereft, and where, out of gratitude, he did the king much fervice. The young duchefs, in her perplexed circumflances, trufting to the advice of her chancellor, and being dazzled with the founding titles of Maximilian, confented to elpouse him; and fent over the prince of Orange, with other ambaffadore, to prefs king Henry to act with vigour in fupport of a princefs, whole father had protected him when in yet deeper diffress. The lord of Albret. perceiving that he had no hopes left, by an unaccountable mixture of refentment and loyalty, reconciled himfelf to the king, and contributed to put the rich city of Nantes into his handse. In the mean time Henry acted in a very ambiguous manner; for the Flemings having again broke out in rebellion against Maximilian, and being supported A.D.1400. by the French, he fent affiftance to the king of the Romans, and entered into an alliance with him, with the emperor his father, and with Ferdinand king of Caftile and Arragon, against France; but at the fame time he treated with Charles, demanding first the kingdom of France, next the duchies of Guicane and Normandy, and laftly, the arrears of the penfion due by the treaty of Pequigny, which amounted to a very confiderable fum, and which was his real object d.

Gaesin períon to Bourges to release the duke of Orisans.

The king, perceiving now in what manner Henry might be pacified, having little fear of the king of the Romans, and believing the acquifition of Bretagne was worth running fome hazard, refolved to push things to the utmost. With this view he directed the count de Dunois and the prince of Orange to negociate his marriage with the duchefs of Bretagne, at the fame time that his troops befieged her in the city of Rennes. 'The king's agents in vain reprefented to the duchefs, that the king was young, a great prince, and who had plaufible pretentions to her whole dominions, grounded on the cellions made to his father by the last heirs of the count of Penthievre, to whom, in cafe of the failure of heirs male, the duchy was to defeend; his claim of forfeiture, upon the charge of felony, depending in parliament against her father; and the right he might pretend to Bretagne, as a hef reverting to the crown che extinction of the male line. To this the de de oppofed her marriage to Maximilian, which had han notified to her allies, had been publicly proclaimed, and his name joined with her's in acts of government : the added, that Charles himfelf was contracted to the princefs Margaret, daughter to her hufband Maximilian, a treaty which had been as publicly acknowleged; fo that thef- feemed infuperable bars to a marriage, which mult, in other reliefts, be very contrary to her inclinations, fince the had been always bred up in an averfion to France, and had no reafons whatever to combat that averfion in favour of this monarch °. To this remonstrance it was replied, that Maximilian had himfelf deferted her, at a time when he ought to have hazarded all things for her fervice; and that, probably, he might make his peace at her expence. That the king's contract was no marriage; and that, being made purely upon reafons of ftate, it might, from the like reafons, be diffolved, and a difpenfation for that purpole be procured from Rome f. The duchefs not yielding to thefe arguments, the king was advifed to fet the duke of Orleans at liberty, and to make, ufe of his interest; but to this expedient, though the match was of her own propoling, the duchels of Bourbon would by no means confent. The fieur de Miolans, the king's favourite, told him, that he was now of an age to govern by himfelf; that his own age and the peace of his dominions depended upon his thorough reconciliation with the duke of Orleans; and that he might fecure this by making that prince's grace depend folely on himfelf's. Charles, wrought upon by these folicitations, went to the tower of Bourges, where the duke of Orleans was confined, and, after a fhort conference with him, fet him at liberty, and fent him into Bretagne, where he very quickly performed all that was expected from him. Though he geais, in Touraine, and celebrated the fame day the contract was figned h. This marriage aftonished all Europe, and feemed to excite fuch a jealoufy in its principal potentates against Charles, as was like to prove fatal to France. Maximilian exclaimed against the ambition and falshood of a prince, who had quitted his own wife to feize the wife of his fahis expedither-in-law. Henry, who faw himfelf outwitted, was really angry, and thewed his refentment to plainly, that he obtained a great fupply from his parliament, and great fums from his people, for the invation of France. Ferdinand the Catholic repeated his claim to Roufillon and Cerdagne, and at the fame time affembled troops on the frontiers of Arragon. Charles continued at Tours with a confiderable army about him, but without difcovering any great emotion, or making any extracrdinary preparations for repelling the confederates. The archduke Philip had demanded his fifter, but the king refused to part with her. Maximilian found means to furprife St. Omers and Arras, and his troops found a passage into Amiens; but, by the fpirit and fidelity of the inhabitants, were driven A.D.1492. out again. In the operations of this campaign, the king of the Romans was affifted by an English fleet i. In the autumn Henry landed in France one of the fineft and beft appointed armies that was ever transported from England, and, on the 15th of October, invefted Boulogne; he knew very well that Maximilian could not, and that Ferdinand would not execute the treaties they had made with him for invading France; and he forefaw this at the time he made them. He conducted this fiege in fuch a manner as to make it very fatiguing to his troops; and all the time was treating with Charles, with whom he concluded the famous treaty of Estaples, which may be esteemed a mafter-piece of policy in both kings k. Having finished the war he returned well fatisfied into England, and left Charles very well pleafed. Maximilian, unable to continue the war, and unwilling to conclude a peace, fuffered his fon, the archduke Philip, to make a truce for a year !.

It is generally reported by the French writers, that Ferdinand over-reached Charles in fettling their difpute. His agent at the court of France was a Cordelier, who is faid to have influenced Oliver Maillard, the king's confessor, and John Mauleon, who acted in the fame capacity to the duchels of Bourbon, both monks of his own order, by prefents of Spanish wine of a very rich flavour; that is, confiderable fums of ready gold put up in cafks m, Thefe reverend fathers, thus instructed, perfuaded the king and the duchefs, that nothing troubled their father Lewis fo much on his death-bed, as the great injuffice he had committed in retaining the counties of Rouffillon and Cerdagne; and that, dying in a difpolition to reftore them, his foul fuffered incredible pains till this was accomplifhed ; in confequence of this reprefentation the king confented to the restitution of those two counties, on the repayment of three hundred thousand crowns; and afterwards freely remitted that fum on the faith of Ferdinand's promife not to make war on France, or to fupport any of his allies with whom France should be at war; in all probability this promife was the great object the king had in view, in a generofity for which he is univerfally condemned by all political hiftorians ".

After fo many treaties concluded, on purpose to leave Ubon what France without enemies from old quarrels when the was motives about to embark in new, it is no wonder that Charles in- Charles clined to adjust his disputes with the house of Austria, and in the war he accordingly effected this aim by the treaty of Senlis, of Natles. concluded with the archduke Philip; by which it was agreed, that the princefs Margaret should be restored to her family, with all her fortune and jewels; and that the counties of Burgundy, Artois, and Auxerre, a few places only excepted, fhould be likewife reftored, as they were yielded to France in confideration of her marriage. Henry the Seventh of England was, at his own defire, included as the ally of both parties °. The view of all these negociations was to put it in the young king's power to vindicate his title to the crown of Naples, fuppofed to defeend to him from the fecond houfe of Anjou, which ended in Charles count of Maine, in virtue of whofe will the county of Provence had been annexed to the crown P. fometimes difguifed it, under a pretence of making war against the Turks. It is very certain that the project was difliked by the wifest and ablest heads in the French council, who urged, that the king had not money, troops, officers, or flatefmen in any degree adequate to fuch a defign; but he had those about him who represented it as very eafy, and to thefe he liftened. They were chiefly Stephen de Vers, his valet de chambre, the fon of a taylor of Dauphiné, and William Brifonnet, the fon of an under officer in the revenue, who, by his own favour, had been raifed to the management of the finances; men of very limited capacities, whole abilities were only known to, and confided in by the king 9. The true fecret was, that Lewis Sforza, furnamed the Moor, aimed at the entire poffeffion of the duchy of Milan, which he governed already in the name of his nephew John Galeas, fon to his elder brother, whom he kept a kind of prifoner; but being married to the daughter of Alonio, duke of Calabria, a princefs of great wildom and fpirit, he durft not depofe and murder him, as he intended, till the affairs of Italy fhould be fo embarraffed as to leave him nothing to fear from the king of Naples; and this confideration it was that induced him to call in Charles. But it is not poffible to fay what it was that induced this prince to engage in fuch an enterprize, on a right not the most clear, with few troops, less treasure, and no allies , unless Lodowie Sforza, the administrator of Milan, might be confidered in that light, and he was fuch an ally as no other prince would truft. Alexander the Sixth then occupied the fee of Rome, of whom the Italians, who fpeak respectfully of popes, fay, that he was without faith, without mercy, and without religion . Ferdinand; king of Naples, had a bad character; the reputation of his fon Alonfo, duke öf Calabria was but indifferent; but his grandfon Ferdinand was much effeemed. The republic of Florence was governed by Peter de Medicis, whom the people hated ; and that of Genoa fubject to the administration of Milan, who had done homage for it to Charles himfelf.

The king having, by the advice of his favourites, rejected the proposition made by Ferdinand, king of Naples, who offered to do him honiage for that kingdom, and to pay him a tribute of fifty thousand crowns a year', prepared for

The most bitter of these was the pope, who, having already applied without effect to moft of the princes in Europe, at length depended on the Turkifh foltan Bajazet, with whom he entered into a clofe alliance, receiving an annual fublidy for keeping his brother Zizime in prifon, and having a promife of three hundred thousand ducats, whenever he should think proper to earn it, by putting him to death "; and from him he expected, in virtue, as is faid, of a treaty, a numerous body of troops : but, in the mean time, Andrew Palæologus, defpot of Romania, the fole heir of the emperor his uncle, made a refignation at Rome of all his rights to the empire of Conftantinople, but without the pope's knowlege, to Charles VIII.

As foon as the king recovered, his forces began to defile He prointo Italy, confifting in the whole of about fix thoufand 'ceeds to horfe, and twelve thoufand foot, one half of whom were enters the Swifs. By that time the king arrived at Turin, he had no money, a fituation which obliged him to borrow the jewels of the duchefs of Savoy; and at Caffal, the marchionels of Montferrat did him the like favour ; upon thefe he raifed twenty-four thoufand ducats, which enabled him to proceed to Pavia, where he found the young duke of Milan dying of poifon; and there Lodovic Sforza left Charles to go and take poffeffion of the duchy, though the young duke had left a fon y. On the 17th of November, he entered Florence in triumpha. To Sienna and Pifa he reftored liberty. Having pretcribed fuch terms to the Florentines as his circumstances required, and under which their fituation obliged them to acquiefce, he proceeded to Rome, and the pope having thut himfelf up in the caftle of St. Angelo, the king, armed at all points, entered Rome as a conqueror, at the head of his army, by torch-light, on the laft night of the year b; and there he performed feveral acts of fovereignty,

The cardinals, who had any regard for justice and religion, preffed the king to force the caftle, and to depofe the pope; but he was diverted from this by William de Brifonnet, now become an ecclefiaftic, and bifhop of St. Malo, who, for this merit, received a cardinal's hat c. The pope, however, was compelled to make a treaty, by which he put feveral ftrong places into the king's hand; gave him the inveftiture of the kingdom of Naples, yielded his fon Cafar Borgia as an hoftage; and delivered up the Turkish prince Zizime, who is faid to have been poifoned, and who certainly died foon after d. Towards the clofe of January, the king began his march for Naples. His behaviour, however, was of a very different nature; for he amufed himfelf with feafts and fhews; and leaving his power in the hands of his favourites, they abandoned it to whoever would purchafe titles, place, or authority, at the rates which they imposed. Gilbert, count of Montpensier, was declared viceroy; the lord D'Aubigny, conftable of the kingdom; Stephen Vers had the duchy of Nola for his fhare, and the whole force he propofed to leave in his new acquired kingdom, confifted but of four thousand men.

But while the king was lofing his time, his enemies A.D. 1494. were making the most of their's. A league was concluded at Venice against him, into which entered the pope, the The king emperor Maximilian, the archduke Philip, Ferdinand to his dothe Catholic, Lodowic Sforza, and the Venetians. He minions, had intelligence of this from Philip de Commines, his mi- and defeats nister at Venice ; but he could fcarce believe it. On the 6th of July he fage. attacked that mighty army, and defeated them, with the lofs only of fourfcore men, after which action he marched with great diligence to Aft f. From thence, after fome ftay, he marched to difengage the duke of Orleans, who was befieged in Novara, by Lodowic Sforza, and the army of the allies; but, before he arrived, the duke had capitulated, and had leave to join the king with his half-ftarved garrifon g. Under these circumstances he was joined by fixteen thousand Swifs, a reinforcement which enabled him once more to give law: but, having made a treaty with Lodowic Sforza, by which he obtained Novara and the port of Spezzia, together with a large fum of money for himfelf, and another for the duke of Orleans, and a promife to fend fuccours to Naples, he fet out immediately for Lyons h. Ferdinand, being affifted with Spanish troops, under the command of Gonfalez de Cordova, furnamed the Great Captain, recovered his kingdom almost as foon as he had loft it, notwithstanding a victory gained by the conftable d'Aubigny i.

The

Some preparations for renewing the war in Italy rendered abortive.

The king's favourite; Stephen de Vers, to whom he had given the duchy of Nola, found means to return into France, and earnefly perfuaded him to refume the conqueft of Naples ; he fnewed him that he had many friends in Italy, by whom he might be affifted with whatever he wanted, without putting his own dominions to any great expence ; that the Florentines would furnish money ; the Swifs, troops ; that doing justice upon tyrants, and fetting the great cities at liberty, would fecure his paffage, and facilitate his conquefts. The king liftened to this advice. in which there was a great deal of truth, raifed forces. and made dispositions as if he intended to repais the mountains: but the cardinal of St. Malo, who had been the prime author of the first war, was against these meafures, being now, as most authors fay, entirely in the intereft of the pope k. The duke of Orleans refufed the command of the army, perceiving that the king's health declined, and that confequently his intereft lay in being near the court, a circumftance which defeated the expedition 1. The French, in the kingdom of Naples, who had fhut themselves up in fuch fortresses as were still in their power, were gradually compelled to capitulate. The count de Montpenfier was blocked up in Aftella, where he was at last forced to fubmit to a composition upon very hard terms, and died afterwards of the plague at Puzzoli m. The constable D'Aubigny threw himfelf into Gropoli, where he made a glorious defence, and furrendered at laft upon honourable terms, by which he was permitted to march out with all his forces, drums beating, and colours flying; but this was the laft effort; and the new king of Naples, Frederick, who had fucceeded his ne-A.D.1495; phew, fwept the reft of the garrifons with eafe. This turn to pleafure was alike fatal to his affairs cafily. and to his health. When he had formed a defign of paffing a fecond time into Italy, and had advanced with that view to the very frontiers of his dominions, he made a fhort turn, and came back to Tours, on the fcore of an amour he had commenced with one of the queen's maids of honour °. This mutability of his temper, and continual fluctuation of measures, must have been fatal to his government, if any of his neighbours had been potent enough to have turned it to their advantage. (G) This prince was born in the caffle of Amboife, June 30, 1470. He had nothing pleafing about his perfon except his eyes, and difcovered no great abilities, a defect which might, however, be very well afcribed to his total want of education : for that he did not want parts is very apparent. He was much reftricted by his fifter, the dame de Beaujeu, who governed with great capacity in his name, though at his acceffion the was but twenty-two years of age. He was quickly weary of her tutelage ; and, by the advice of George d'Amboife, bishop of Montauban, cardinal and prime minister in the next reign, would have inade his efcape, in order to have gone to the duke of Orleans; but the perfon entrusted with the letter, to make his own fortune, betrayed them all. He was naturally inclined to reading, efpecially the history of his own country, and this inclined him to bulinefs, and to gain a thorough knowlege of his own affairs; but the young people who were about him took great pains to draw him from his itudies, and to render him. like themfelves, attentive only to pleafure, in which they fucceeded but too well. He is allowed, though the worft educated, to be the best bred king that ever fat upon the throne; infomuch that those who knew him beft, affirm he never fpoke a difobliging word in his whole reign. He was from hence furnamed the Affable and the Courteous. He married the heirefs of Bretagne, in his twenty-fecond year, and by her had three fons and a daughter. The dauphin Charles died when he was three years and a half old, foon after the king's return out of Italy, a circumstance which affected the queen extremely ; but the king is faid to have bore it with the more patience, as the fprightly parts of the young prince had already awakened in his breaft fome fparks of jealoufy, which is furely a firen z token of his being the true fon of Lewis X1. The other children died all in their infancy. He did fome very good things for the flate : he re-united the important country of Provence to the crown (1); he inftituted the grand council as a fovereign court for the regulating affairs of war and the finances; he alfo inflituted public audiences twice a week, in which he heard perfons of all ranks; and though, as Commines remarks, there were no great matters done in these audiences, yet they were of very great ufe, as they kept ministers in awe; for they knew that a prince, who made it a point to hear every body, was very like to hear the truth from fomebody (2). ### The Reign of Louis XII. furnamed the Father of his People, who, from Duke of Orleans, became King, and was the only Monarch of his House.

Accession of Lewis XII, his noble and humane behaviour upon that occafon to all ranks of people. T HE right of fucceffion was fo well established, and the duke of Orleans had been fo long confidered as the prefumptive heir of the crown, that he fucceeded without any opposition, by the title of Lewis XII. to which he added, by his actions, the most glorious of all furnames, that of the Father of his People w. He was thirty-fix years of his age complete, at the time of his fucceffion, equally effected by the nobility, and beloved by the peo-him by the fame writer is at once very fimple and very expreflive. " Charles VIII. fays he, was, in truth, but a little man, and of no great reach; but he was fo good, that it was not poffible to find a better creature." His queen paffed two days upon the ground without food or fleep, weeping inceffantly, and mourned for him in black, whereas the the mourning of queens had till then been white (3). He was buried with prodigious magnificence by the care and command of his fucceffor, that his fubjects might take notice of his great refpect for his predeceffor (4). But there happened fomewhat at his funeral, which did much more honour to his memory: one of the grooms of his chamber, and one of the archers of his guard, when they faw the body of their master deposited in St. Denis, dropped down dead with grief (5). In him ended the direct line of Valois, of which he was the feventh monarch, and after they had governed the realm of France one hundred and feventy years (6).

ple. He was crowned at Rheims, on the 27th of May, and immediately remitted a tenth part of all imposts. He continued all the minifters, magiftrates, and officers, employed by his predeceffor, to the amazement of the whole nation, and even of the individuals themfelves *. When fome put him in mind that Lewis de la Trimouille, had made him prifoner at the battle of St. Aubin, and was now at his mercy; he made that ever memorable anfwer, " That it did not become a king of France to revenge the quarrels of a duke of Orleans." It is one thing to deliver a fine maxim, and another to make it the rule of one's conduct; but Lewis did both. The duke and duchefs of Bourbon looked upon themfelves as difgraced, and could fcarce believe him in earneft, when the king not only affured them of his pardon, but of his affection. He very foon put it out of doubt : it was provided, by their contract of marriage, that in cafe they died without heirs male, the vaft effates of the family fhould be united to the crown; they had an only daughter, whom they meant to marry to Charles count of Montpenfier, fon to Gilbert, who died in Italy; the king frankly renounced his interest, and thereby rendered her the heirefs of the first line of Bourbon. He treated the queen-dowager with all possible A.D. 1498. marks of refpect, fettled her jointure to her fatisfaction, allowed her to return into Bretagne, and to affume the fovereignty of her own dominionsy. But at the fame time that he piqued himfelf on his clemency and goodnature, he fhewed likewife his great fpirit and refolution; he reftored the military difcipline of the army, which had been much relaxed; he obliged the magistrates and officers of the crown to do their duty; and the university and preachers at Paris having taken the liberty to confure his actions, he chaftized their infolence, and made them fenfible that he would be obeyed (H).

He was defirous of pofterity, and he had other motives which induced him to wifh the diffolution of his marriage with Joan the daughter of Lewis XI. In an affair of this nature he flood in need of the affiftance of the pope. There never was one more fit for his purpofe than Alexander VI. He was defirous of providing for his baftard Cæfar Borgia, who had refigned the cardinal's hat, that he might aft in another fphere. He fent him into France with a bull, by which he appointed Lewis bifhop of Alby and Ferdinand bifhop of Ceuta commiffioners, to whom he afterwards added cardinal Philip of Luxemburgh. It is generally faid by the French hiftorians, that queen Joan,

England, and, after his return to France, made an unfuccefsful attempt to recover the duchy of Milan. He was thrice married, first to Ifabella of France, the widow of Richard II. king of England, who died in childbed. By her he had only one daughter, Joan or Jane of Orleans, who efpoufed John II. duke of Alencon, by whom the had no iffue. His fecond wife was Bonna, daugher of Bernard VIII. count of Armagnac, and con-* stable of France, by whom he had no children. His third confort was Mary, the daughter of Adolph, duke of Cleves, by Mary the daughter of John the Fearlefs, and the fifter of Philip the Good, duke of Burgundy, by whom he had Lew. is, of whom we are to fpeak, and Mary, who was thrice married; first to John, vifcount of Narbonne, the fecond fon of Gaston count de Foix; fecondly, John marquis of Brandenburgh; thirdly, to Ferdinand of Arragon, duke of Calabria. Lewis married the younger daughter of king Lewis XI. who was deformed. In his youth he entered into a clofe friendship with George d'Amboife, who, after the death of Francis count of Dunois and Longueville, became his fole confidant. He procured for him, first the archbishoprick of Narbonne, and afterwards that of Rouen, in his own government of Normandy. He quarrelled with Charles VIII. becaufe, when he demanded a cardinal's hat for Brifonnot, bifliop of St. Maloes, he did not alfo demand one for his favourite d'Amboise (1). He gave the king also fome other causes of offence. Charles in the latter end of his life would have put him at the head of his army, and was defirous that he fhould have made war in his own name, for the recovery of his duchy of Milan; but this expedition he declined, fuppofing that, from his ill state of health, the king could not laft long, which motive either Charles penetrated himfelf, or was told by others, and refented it highly; fo that at the time of his decease, Lewis was in a kind of difgrace (2).

who was a very pious and good princefs, gave the king no opposition; but it appears from records that this is not true ; the defended her marriage with all the vigour imaginable; but, when the found it to no purpole, the fubmitted patiently, and the king granted her the revenues of the duchy of Berry, with fome additional rents, which the fpent in works of charity, and led, during the remainder of her days, a quiet and exemplary life z. Cæfar Borgia reaped the fruits of his father's condefcention; the king made him duke of Valentinois, and gave him in marriage the daughter of the lord of Albret, a lady of high birth, and his own relation.

The next great point the king had in view, was to conclude Precaua marriage with the widow of his predeceffor; this negocia- tions taken tion of great importance was very quickly terminated, and, pylerwsto the neceffary treaties and contracts being concluded and prace at prace figned, the marriage was folemnized on the 8th of January. home. On their majefties making their public entry into Paris, the king added to his other titles those of the Two Sicilies and Jerufalem, together with the duchies of Milan and Bretagne. He claimed the first as heir of the house of Anjou, the fecond as defcending to him from his grandmother, and the third in virtue of his marriage *. The face of affairs was much changed in Italy; the pope was entirely in his interest, from the hopes of advantage; he had conciliated the friendship of the republic of Venice, by promifing them a part of the Milanefe; and, that he might fecure to himfelf better fuccefs than his predeceffor had met with in a like expedition, he took care to have his own dominions in perfect fecurity and quiet. The emperor had invaded the duchy of Burgundy, where his troops had received a defeat, which did not hinder the king from concluding a truce, upon very equal terms, with the archduke Philip, who thereupon did homage to the chancellor of France, at Arras, for the counties of Flanders, Artois, and Charolois b. The king renewed his treaty with Henry the Seventh of England, and his alliances with Scotland and Denmark, and, after taking these precautions, affembled his forces, and prepared, in earnest, for his Italian expedition . archbifhop of Rouen, to whom, out of compliment to the king, the pope had given a hat, and declared him his legate in France, hindered his mafter from commanding in perfon. His forces, confifting of twenty thouland men, were commanded by Lewis of Luxemburgh count de Ligni, Robert Stuart lord d'Aubigny, and John James Trivulce, a native of Milan, who had been in the fervice of his predeceffor <sup>d</sup>.

The duke of Milan had provided every thing for his defence : his places were well fortified, his troops numerous, and the fuccefs of the war might have been doubtful, but that a prince univerfally hated is eafily defeated, when attacked by an equal force. Sforza had kept faith with none, and none kept faith with him. The Venetians, who were to have the country beyond the Adda, made themfelves mafters of it in a week. The French proceeded as brifkly: Novara and Alexandria were quickly taken; Mortara capitulated; the keys of Pavia were obtained without a fiege; and Genoa fubmitted in the like manner: the citizens of Milan opened their gates; and the citadel, the ftrongeft place then in Europe, with provision for two, and ammunition for four years, was fold by Bernardin Curtio, to whom it had been intrufted by Sforza : but the French nobility treated this perfidious adventurer with fuch contempt, that he died in ten days, of mere fhame. As for the duke himfelf, who would have been fold too if he had flaid, he very wifely with drew to Infpruck, with the children and his treafures f. Lewis in perfon paffed the mountains upon the reccipt of these news, and made his entry into Milan, in the ducal habit, on the 6th of October, with the universal acclamations of the people 2. The cardinal d'Amboife his minister, whofe maxim it was, that a people, well governed, would never revolt, reftored all who had been banifhed by Sforza; eftablished a court of justice; remitted a fourth part of their taxes; directed fmall garrifons only to be left in the principal places ; appointed Trivulce governor of the duchy, and gave the command of the horfe to the lord d'Aubigny. Thefe meafures being taken, and a treaty concluded with the Florentines, the king, having received the compliments of all the Italian princes, except Frederick king of Naples, returned home, as he had entered Milan, in triumph. All this fuccefs was justly attributed to the care, circumfpection, and forefight, of cardinal D'Amboife.

A great change was foon effected in the affairs of Italy. not only by the revolutions of Naples, but alfo by the fucceffive deaths of the popes Alexander VI. and Pius III. which laft was fucceeded by Julius II. to the great mortification and difappointment of the cardinal D'Amboife.

Lewis, in refentment of the ill utage which he had met The French with from" Ferdinand the Catholic, attacked Spain with compelled to three armies, two by land, and one that was to act by fea. evacuate The first, commanded by the lord of Albret, and the mar- dom of Nashal de Gie, penetrated as far as Fontarabia, and then re- ples, and tired, without performing any thing, either through want the king of fubfistence, or from some misunderstanding between the concludes a commanders : the remains of this army having joined that with Max commanded by marshal Rieux, befieged Salces, in Rou- imilian and fillon; but the Spaniards advancing with an army to his Philip at relief, they were confirained to raife the fiege h. The Blois. flect, after alarming the coafts of Valentia and Caftile, returned to Marfeilles, without performing any thing worthy of notice. In the kingdom of Naples, the Great Captain took Gaeta in three days, by a capitulation, which permitted all the French officers and foldiers to return home as they could; but as he was never famous for performing his capitulations, fo he broke fhamefully through this; reftraining it to the natives of France, and thrufting all the Italians into dungcons. Lewis d'Ars, one of the A.D 1501. French officers, had retired, after the defeat at Cerignoles, with a handful of men, into Venofa, a place of no great ftrength, where he declared that he rejected the capitulation of Gaeta, and meant to depend upon his fword. The braveft of the French, and of the Italians in the French fervice, reforted to him from all fides; and having given a very fevere check to the Spanish troops which attacked him, he returned through the heart of Italy, drums beating and colours flying, and brought his troops, in good order, into the duchy of Milan; whereas of those who capitulated in Gaeta, very few returned into France i. This reverse of fortune had fuch an effect upon the mind of Lewis, that it threw him into a fit of fickness, which was very near proving mortal. The point he had now chiefly at heart was the re-establishment of peace. A truce had been concluded with Spain for the countries bordering on the fide of the Pyrenees; but the king had fo little dependence on Ferdinand, that he would not fo much as fuffer ' him to participate in this new negociation, which ended in a treaty, concluded at Blois, the 22d of September, between the emperor, the arehduke, who now took the title of king of Caftile and Leon on the death of queen Ifabella, on one fide, and the king on the other *. By this the treaty of marriage between Charles and Claude was again renewed, the kingdom of Naples and many other dominions were confirmed to them, and the investiture of the duchy of Milan promifed to the king, upon payment of a large fum of money. The fpace of four months was allowed to Ferdinand to accept the treaty; and here it was that the contracting parties first engaged to attack the Venetians, though, for the prefent, this defign came to nothing.

On the marriage of Ferdinand with his neice Germain de Foix, Lewis re. nounces, in favour of the children of that marriage, his preten. fions to the kingdoni of Naples.

The king, who had a great dependence on the treaty concluded laft year, and who, above all, had fixed his heart upon obtaining the inveftiture of the duchy of Milan, fent cardinal D'Amboife into Germany to receive it; which he did, after paying homage, and paying alfo a large fum of money 1. But the cardinal clearly perceived at this interview, that nothing was to be expected as to the emperor's performance of what he had flipulated of entering into Italy, in order to, act against the Venetians ", whom Ferdinand the Catholic had informed of the confederacy that was upon the carpet against them ". The king falling fick, and, at the turn of his difeafe, being thought paft recovery, the queen caufed her richeft furniture, her jewels, and her wealth, to be embarked on the Loire, in order to convey them to the caftle of Nantes "; but in their paffage, they were flopped at Saumur, by the mar-A D. 1505, fhal de Gie P, who thought that, at this time, fhe ought to be occupied only about the king's perfon. This affront, fhe refented fo highly, as to procure him to be fufpended from his employments, the most confiderable of which was being governor to the count of Angoulefme, and to be forbid the court 9. But posterity rendered him justice, and have confidered this as the meaneft action of her's and the king's life. The views of Philip, now in right of his wife

Joan,

Joan, king of Castile, alarmed Ferdinand, his father-inlaw, fo much, that, recollecting the tendernefs which Lewis had expressed for his niece Germain de Foix, he fent an ecclesiaftic into France, to try whether, after all their difputes, he might not recover the friendship of the king by efpouling that lady; this propolition being extremely well received, he concluded a new treaty, by which the kingdom of Naples was fettled on his pofterity, by the new queen, in favour of whom Lewis renounced all his pretentions, except as to the expences of the war, for which he was to receive one hundred thousand ducats. for ten years together : what redounded highly to his honour, he flipulated that all the Neapolitan nobility, who were feized by the Great Captain, fhould be fet at liberty; and that the eftates of fuch as had been confifcated for their adherence either to him, or to the house of Anjou. fhould be reftored, which reftitution, as things were now circumstanced, Ferdinand found himfelf obliged to promife, and the king took care that he fhould be likewife obliged to perform ".

At the time of the king's ficknefs, in the preceding year, Marries the nobility of France began to entertain great apprehen- the princefs fions of the alliance flipulated by the treaty of Blois, by Claude to which not only the Italian dominions, but likewife the duchy the count d'Angou. of Bretagne, and other important countries, were to be lefme. given with the king's daughter to Charles of Luxemburgh, on which, having modeftly reprefented their thoughts to the king, he appointed an affembly of the flates to be held at Tours, in the month of May. There, having received their remonstrances, and another from the states of Bretagne, who were more immediately concerned, he refolved, after mature deliberation, to yield to their requeft "; and thereupon contracted the princefs Claude to Francis count of Angoulefme : by this meafure he revenged himfelf fufficiently of all the flights he had received from the houfe of Auftria; but, at the fame time, fhewed be could make free with treaties as well as they. In the circumftances Maximilian then flood in, he could not refent it, and death removed king Philip before he had an opportunity of expreffing his fentiments : but the fincerity of his friendship to the king he had already clearly shewed, by his appointing him tutor to his fon Charles, which

At his return, he refufed to go on fhore at Genoa, and, when fome deputies from the city came to compliment him on board his galley, he told them that he underflood there were factions amongft them, that poffibly might end in a revolt, which they would find not for their interefts; but that, at all events, they were to expect no allifance from him. What he predicted came to pafs; the people, having drove out the nobility, chofe eight tribunes, and declared Paul Nuova, a filk-dyer, their duke; expelled the French governor, and reduced a great part of the Riviera ".

On the iffue of this war depended not only the continuance of the French power in Italy, but the reputation of their monarchy in Europe. The pope, forgetting the protection given him in France during the reign of Alexander VI. and the many favours he had received from cardinal d'Amboife, was the principal author of this revolt, to which the emperor alfo was no firanger, and the Pifans encouraged and fupported it by their troops ". As foon as the news arrived at court, the cardinal fuggefted to the king the neceffity of going in perfon into Italy, if he meant to reduce Genoa, or preferve Milan; but the queen, who had a great afcendancy over him, oppofed it with all her power, not only out of tendernefs to his perfon, but becaufe the thought it would raife the minister's credit, and fix his authority *. Inflead of wearying and diffurbing his mafter with repeated folicitations, the cardinal prefied the military preparations in fuch a manner, that, at the very opening of the campaign, he had a numerous army, well officered, and a most amazing quantity of artillery, with the boft engineers that were in Europe, whom he had drawn from all quarters into the fervice. The expedition appeared fo fure, and the glory of it fo great, that Lewis could not refift the defire of commanding in perfon, a circumstance which added, under the title of volunteers, all the young noblemen in the kingdom y.

These advantages made them shew little or no regard to the overtures made, from time to time, by the king, who was naturally merciful, and had not the inclination of coming to extremities: but, when these could not be avoided, he committed the van-guard of the army to his most experienced officers, who quickly forced the paffes, and at length came in fight of the new fort. This being very difficult of accefs, the Swifs, when commanded, declined the attack z; but, when they faw the French infantry mount to the affault, their first lines, confisting entirely of officers, attempting it, they fupported them very gallantly, and contributed not a little to their carrying the place. The Genoefe were fo difconcerted at this first exploit, that they fent deputies to demand the king's pardon, and, under colour of that treaty, endeavoured to furprife his camp<sup>2</sup>: but they had to do with those who underflood perfectly their manner of fighting, and their manner of treating. The king refufed fo much as to fee their deputies : the cardinal told them it was too late to think of terms; and that all they could expect was to furrender at diferetion; which advice, when it could be no longer avoided, they were obliged to take. The proper A D. 1507. guards being posted, and the people entirely difarmed, the king, on the 29th of April, entered the city on horfeback. at the head of his army b. His afpect was ftern, his fword drawn in his hand, but on his coat of arms was depicted a royal bee, with a fwarm on every fide; which device was accompanied with thefe words : Non utitur acules rex cui parcmus; that is, " The monarch we obey uses no fling." After a whole week's keeping them in terror, the king declared, that though, for their rebellion, they had forfeited their lives and eltates, and that, having fo often refufed it, they had no title to his clemency, yet, in compaffion to their diffrefs, he pardoued them, their chiefs only excepted, of whom Paul Nuova and Demetrius Juftiniani fuffered death, and on the city he impofed a fine of three hundred thousand ducats. The emperor had prevailed upon the dyet to affift him with a great army, upon an affurance that the king meant nothing lefs than the entire conquest of Italy: but when Lewis, by difmiffing his troops, demonstrated the falfehood of this fuggeftion, the princes of Germany grew cool, and the emperor, attempting to pafs a fmall body of his own troops into Italy, they were repulfed with lofs by the Venetians<sup>d</sup>.

the league of Cambray.

The emperor Maximilian, being extremely provoked at - the oppolition given his army by the Venetians, reinforced Enters into his troops, and at length marched in perfon; but, in a fhort time, found himfelf fo much diftreffed for money, that he was conftrained to retire. The Venetians, who were now joined by a body of French troops, under the command of the marfhal Trivulce, thought proper to afk his confent to a truce for three years, which was offered them by Maximilian. Trivulce readily offered to fign, if the truce was general, and the allies on both fides comprehended in all places: but this condition the emperor refused; and the republic, finding that truce of confequence to them, fubfcribed it, notwithstanding the French general's proteft. The motives to his proposition was the king's having excited the duke of Guelders to arm against the houfe of Auftria in the Low Countries; and, as he was in fome danger, it was requifite to preferve him by this expedient; which, having failed, the king was much provoked. Maximilian was much more fo, as his being forced to make fuch a truce; and, by the interpolition of Margaret, governels of the Low Countries, propoled to Lewis the reviving that project, which had been approved fome years before, for the deftruction of this too powerful republic. The king, and his minister the cardinal, hated the Venetians; and the council in general, when this propolition came to be examined, concurred with them in opinion. Stephen Poncher, bishop of Pavia, a man of parts and probity, was the fingle opponent : he faid the republic of Venice was the only power in Italy that was not engaged in interest to disposses the king of the duchy of Milan; that Lewis could depend little upon the pope; that Maximilian and Ferdinand the Catholic had deceived him often, and, as foon as they found their account in it, would deceive him again : but, notwith-

ftanding this remonstrance, cardinal d'Amboife was fent to treat with Margaret, who had the emperor's powers; and, with her, under pretence of regulating the difputes in the Low Countries, he, after a long negociation, concluded the famous treaty of Cambray, by which the flate of Venice was configned to deftruction, and the king obtained the inveftiture of the duchy of Milan fimply for himfelf and his heirs ".

This league of Cambray was one of the greateft and Views of most fingular events that Europe had ever feen, as being a league founded in refentment, and diametrically opposite to the interests of every one of the contracting powers. treaty of The republic of Venice was grown extremely potent, and Cambray. not by the most direct methods; for great power in flates, like great wealth amongst private men, is very rarely acquired but by fraud or oppression : but the republic of Venice was the bulwark of Italy; it prevented the pope from drawing the emperor, or the king of the Romans, as the phrafe then was, into Lombardy, against the French; moderated the views of king Lewis, and hindered him from extending his conquefts; kept the pope from being reduced to a flate of dependency, and preferved to Ferdinand the Catholic the kingdom of Naples. All this influence refulted from their great power, however that power might be acquired; and therefore, though it might be the interest of each of these potentates, separately, to recover, if possible, what had been taken from them by the republic; yet, to oblige her to refun l all her conquefts, was to reduce a power of which they were all afraid, and open a fource thereby of perpetual wars amongft themfelves. The catholic king wanted to have Trani, Monopoli, Brindifi, Otranto, Gallipoli, and other towns on the Adriatic gulph reftored to him. The Venetians had acquired fome by mortgage, and had feized the reft; but it was by the held of their money, and the affiftance they had given, that Naples was preferved to the houfe of Arragon, and had been acquired by Ferdinand. The emperor, by a mixt title, as head of the empire and of the houle of Auftria, formed pretentions on the patriarchate of Aquileia, fome towns in Friuli, Rovero in the Trentin, and Verona, Padua, and Vicenza, beyond the Alps. What the king defired was, Cremona, Crema, Brefeia, Bergamo, and the country beyond the Adda. It is true, he had yielded this to them in confideration of their affifting him to conquer the reft of the Milanefe, but, after all, the Milanefe was not complete without them h. Faenza and Rimini had been usurped from the church by tyrants; Cæfar Borgia had difpoffeffed those tyrants; from him they were taken by the Venetians, and pope Julius was willing to have them again i. The allies were to be ready to act by the 1st of April, before which time the pope was to fignify to the republic what reflitutions he expected; upon their refufal, he was to excommunicate them, and to demand the emperor's affiftance, as the protector of the church, in which quality he might act against the Venetians, without breach of his oath, in refpect to the truce he had fworn to keep for a year k. Julius, though in effect the first mover of this treaty, repented it very early; he forefaw its confequences, and endeavoured to make the ftate of Venice conceive them, offering to diffolve the league, if Faenza and Rimini were reftored : but the republic, confident of her own ftrength, rejected the propofal; upon which Julius ratified the treaty, which, for fome time he had delayed 1.

Lewis paffes the mountains, to command his army in per/on, attendeed by the cardi nal, Cardinal d'Amboife, whofe averfion to the Venetians had dictated this measure to the French court, acted with that indefatigable diligence, which was the characteriftic of his ministry, in order to carry it into execution. He prepared every thing for the campaign; caufed the troops to march; took the Swifs into pay, and brought every thing to bear by the time that had been fixed, though he faw all the reft of the allies backward m. He prevailed upon his master to pass the mountains once more, in order to command his army in perfon, notwithstanding the intreaties and tears of his queen, for whom he had not only great tendernefs, but much deference alfo for her counfels. The cardinal himfelf, though afflicted with the gout, a flow fever, and an inveterate colic, paffed the Alps in a litter; for it was his maxim to leave nothing to others that it was pollible for him to do". When the army came to take the field, it appeared that the confederates intended to leave the whole burthen upon the French, and to referve for themfelves whatever advantages might arife, either from their victory or defeat. It was impossible that the cardinal fhould not difeern thefe views, and yet he advifed the king to march directly and give battle to the enemy?. The marshal de Chaumont, nephew to the cardunal, and governor of Milan, had furprifed the town of Treviglio, on the other fide the Adda; the Venetians befieged it; their army confifted of three thoufand men at arms, four thousand light horse, and thirty thousand foot, commanded by count Petigliani, and by Bartholomew d'Alviana, the former cool as water, the latter hot as fire P. The king had two thousand three hundred men at arms, as many volunteers of the first families in his kingdom, eight thousand Swifs foot, and thirteen thousand of his own fubjects, the best infantry that France had ever feen. In marching to the relicf of Treviglio, the van-guard was commanded by marfhal Chaumont, fupported by marfhal Trivulce; the king having the duke of Bourbon, La Tremouille, and many other perfons of the first rank about him, commanded the main body, and the duke de Longueville conducted the rear. The Venetians had taken the place by capitulation, notwithflanding which they had burnt and plundered it. This transaction gave the king leifure to pafs the Adda without opposition.

The king's defign was to feize Valla; the enemy had The Venethe fame defign, which brought on a battle, contrary to tians dethe intention of the Venetians, who were inflructed to feated at avoid it by all means. It was fought on the 14th of May, between Vaïla and Aignadel, and the Venetians were totally defeated; they loft their cannon, baggage, colours, a vaft quantity of ammunition, nine thouland men killed, and as many taken. Bartholomew de Alviana, whofe warmth occasioned the battle, breathed his last on the field ; and it was a formight before the count of Petigliana could affemble the remains of his army. Cardinal d'Amboife took care that this victory fhould be improved. Before the enemy's firft terror was over, all the places the king demanded furrendered at diferetion : Pefquera was the only one that made a defence; it was carried by affault; and the king caufed the proveditor and his fon, who defended it, to be hanged, and the garrifon cut to pieces, becaufe the Venetians had violated the capitulation of Treviglio 9. Upon this great blow the republic loft her courage to fuch a degree, that fhe demanded peace from all the great powers that had embarked in the league, on their own terms; and, at the fame time, gave orders to the governors of those places to withdraw their garrifons. Thus the pope and king Ferdinand acquired all they fought by the war, and the emperor might have done the fame if his army had been in Italy . The cities which he claimed being evacuated, offered their keys to king Lewis, who, in regard to his alliance, refused them. The emperor's indolence, and the king's great moderation, faved the state of Venice; for the inhabitants of Trevifa having refufed to admit the Imperial commissary, who came without troops, the republic fupported them; foon after they A.D. 1509. furprifed Padua, and refolved to defend it 3. Maximilian arrived at Trent in the month of June, where he was met by cardinal d'Amboife, to whom he granted the inveftiture of Milan; but, after appointing an interview with the king, the emperor failed, upon which Lewis entered Milan in triumph, and returned into his own dominions, having concluded a new treaty with the pope, and leaving a body of auxiliaries to act in conjunction with the emperor. The pope abjoives the Vinetians and declares against France. Pope Julius, inftead of executing his treaties, endeavoured to engage the emperor to defift from the war; and not fucceeding in that feheme, gained the electors, who advifed him to make peace. Maximilian perfifting in his own meafures, mortgaged the city and citadel of Verona to Lewis for fifty thou[and ducats*. Julius abfolved the Venetians, and laboured to reconcile them to the emperor, declared openly againft France, and practifed every method to diffrefs king Lewis. With this view he negociated with Henry the Eighth, who had lately fucceeded to the crown of England. He alfo brought over the Swifs, who, having demanded an increase of their pen-

forts, and being refufed by king Lewis, were highly irritated; but the king having obtained troops by the like capitulation with the Grifons and their allies, was the lefs concerned. The death of cardinal d'Amboife, which happened at Lyons on the 25th of May, was a great mortification to the French, as he was equally effeemed by the king, and beloved by the people *. By the perfuation of the pope the Genoefe attempted a revolt without effect ; the Swifs endeavoured to invade the Milanefe, and were conftrained to retire, both by the incomparable prudence of the marshal de Chaumont. Julius granted the investiture of the kingdom of Naples to Ferdinand, and, inftead of the usual tribute, accepted of a gennet, declaring at the fame time, that Lewis had loft all title to the king-The king, notwithstanding this provocation, bedom y. ing grown weary of the war, laboured all he could to conclude a peace, in which he was croffed by the pope, who went fo far as to imprifon an agent from the duke of Savoy, who propoled his mafter's mediation, and even put him to the torture, under colour of taking him for a fpy. Lewis, finding milder methods ineffectual, appointed a general affembly of his clergy at Tours, where they decided that it was lawful to make war on the pope, and to feize his territories, when he was the aggreffor; that his cenfures, in fuch a cafe, were null, and not to be regarded : they forbid the carrying money to Rome, and granted large fublidies, our of all the ecclefiaftical revenues in France, to enable the king to defend himfelf againft the pope 2. The emperor made a new treaty with the king, A.D. 1610. by which he confirmed that of Cambray, and confented to the affembling a general council, in order to bring the pope to reafen. Julius, to fnew that he was not at all intimidated, excommunicated the duke of Ferrera, and befieged his capital; went in perfon to Bologna to promote the fiege, where he was very near being taken by the marfhal Chaumont. Being obliged to raife it, he afterwards invefted Mirandola, notwithstanding feveral cardinals, difpleafed with his conduct, retired to Florence. fon to prefs the fiege, lodged within cannot-fhot of the place, and vifited the trenches. The king, on the contrary, grew more and more tired of the war, which was become very burthenfome, and which exposed his Italian dominions to great inconveniencies, the people of Genoa having configured a fecond time, and the prefervation of that city requiring a conflant fleet in the Mediterranean.

Marshal Trivulce commands the French army, and pusses the pope and his allies.

The pope, in his new vocation of a general, had the honour of reducing Mirandola, after a fiege of three months; and, to fhew how much he was pleafed with it, he made his entry through the breach 2. In the mean time the marshal de Chaumont died of a lingering difease, which he took to be an Italian fever, or, in plain terms, the effects of poilon. He was but thirty-eight years of age, and yet was marshal and admiral of France, governor of the duchies of Milan and Normandy, and one of the ableft officers of his age. The command of the French army devolved upon the marshal Trivulce b. But in the mean time Ferdinand the Catholic, under colour of zeal for religion, and his great respect for the pope, procured a kind of congress to be held at Mantua, in hopes of bringing about a peace, which, however, had no effect. The emperor and the king, in fupport of the feceding cardinals, appointed a general council to be held at Pifa, in the month of September, to which the pope was fummoned. Marfhal Trivulce advancing with an army into the neighbourhood of Bologna, the pope immediately retired into Ravenna; the people revolted in favour of the Bentivoglios; and the garrifon was cut to pieces. The marquis foon after drawing his forces out of that city, attacked the army of the pope and the Venetians, defeated them, and might have marched to Rome, but he knew that his mafter was not inclined to pufh things to extremities. This moderation had no effect upon Julius, who, notwithstanding his being reduced to the very brink of the grave by a difeafe, and lying, in a manner, at the mercy of the French, loft nothing either of his fpirit or his abilities. On the contrary he negociated with Ferdinand and the Swifs; excommunicated the council at Pifa and all their adherents; and declared war against the Florentines. He also called a council himfelf at Rome, and his emiffaries at Pifa made the council that met there fo uneafy, that the members, for their own fecurity, removed to Milan . All this fuccefs was chiefly owing to the irrefolution of Lewis, who, fince the death of cardinal d'Amboife, paid too much regard to the queen's advice, who looked upon a war against the pope as an act of impiety. It was owing to this opinion that, though the king did not defert, he never properly fupported the council, which he had caufed to affemble in order to awe the pope. The emperor, yet more fickle than the king, was defirous of transferring the council into his own dominions, in order to engage them not only to depose the pope, but to raise him (the emperor) to the apostolic fee d. While these monarchs acted A.D.1511 fo ftrange a part, Julius caufed the treaty he had conclud- ed to be proclaimed at Rome with great folemnity, and gave it the title of the Holy League.' The Swifs attacked the duchy of Milan with their whole force; burnt fourteen or fifteen towns and villages, and then retired into their own country; a retreat which fome aferibe to the conduct of Gaston de Foix, duke of Nemours, who har , raffed them continually with fmall parties of horfe; but it is more probable they thought they had done enough, as their principal aim was not the expulsion of the French, but to oblige them to take them again into pay upon their own terms. Don Pedro de Novarra, with the title of general of the league, began to commit hoftilities towards the end of the year, entered into the Ferrarele, and took feveral places: but the Venetians contented themfelves with acting defensively °.

The agents of Lewis had in vain endeavoured to engage Goffin de the Florentines to declare in their favour; but they were of Nemours, wifer, and made choice of a neutrality : cardinal John de lakes Bo-Medicis, at the head of the troops of the pope, and the logna, routs duke of Cordona, viceroy of Naples, at the head of the the Vene-Spanish army, invosted Bologna, but not so completely as tians, and to prevent Gafton duke of Nemours from entering it with Brefeia. his whole army, upon which they raifed the fiege, not without fuffering confiderable lofs in their retreat f. In the mean time the Venetians had furprifed Brefcia, the French garrifon having barely time to retire into the caftle. The duke of Nemours was no fooner informed of this misfortune than he marched to their relief, routed a great body of Venetian troops that attempted to hinder his paffage, and, having entered the citadel in the night, fallied from thence upon the town, which he recovered, after putting to death eight thousand of the enemy ". He had promifed the pillage of the place to his foldiers, and he kept his word; and the value of the plunder is faid to have amounted to three millions of ducats. These exploits. performed in the space of a fortnight, acquired him the. character of the greateft, at the fame time that he was the youngeft general in the French fervice. He received foon after the king's orders to fight the enemy at any rate; for, in the midft of victories, Lewis found his caufe declining b. The king of England had difmiffed his ambaffador from a fcruple of confcience, in holding any friendship with a prince who made war upon the pope. The Florentines were on the point of declaring for the league, and the emperor difposed to defert him; for all which evils a decifive victory was held the only remedy i.

The battle of Raver.na.

The duke of Nemours, in order to oblige the enemy to come to a battle, befieged Ravenna. This ftep had the effect he expected; the confederates marched to its relief, and he advanced to meet them. His army confifted of fixteen thousand foot, eighteen hundred men at arms, and three thousand light horse. He commanded the vanguard in perfon, having with him Alphonfo duke of Ferrara, the main body was commanded by Monf. la Paliffe, and the rear guard by Yves de Allegre. The army of the confederates was pretty near the fame ftrength; they had two thousand men at arms, three thousand archers on horfeback, and fifteen thousand foot. They were commanded by the cardinal John de Medicis, and, under him by Fabricius Colonna, the marquis of Pelcaro, Don Pedro de Novarra, Antonia de Leva, and Don Juan de Cordonak. The battle was fought on Easter-day, the 11th of April : it lafted many hours, but, in the end, the confederates were defeated, and, in all probability, this victory would have anfwered the king's hopes, if, after having gained it like an experienced general, the duke of Nemours had not thrown himfelf away like a young foldier. A corps of four thousand Spaniards retired in good order, he attacked them with thirty gens d'arms, and, not being Pedro de Novarra, Fabricius Colonna, and Juan de Cordona. But the death of the duke of Nemours, in the twenty-third year of his age, more than balanced this advantage, and the taking of Ravenna. The army, for want of pay, difperfed, fo that monficur la Paliffe fearce conducted four thousand men to Milan. The Swifs pour- A.D. 1912. ed twenty thousand men into that duchy, and declared Max milian Sforza duke of it, his father Ludovic being dead. The Genoefe revolted, expelled the French, and declared Janus Fregoza their duke. Henry the Eighth declared for the league; Ferdinand the Catholic expelled the king of Navarre; the pope laid the kingdom of France under an interdict, and offered Henry the title of the Moft Christian King, and even the realm of France, if he would attempt the conqueit of it 1. In this fituation, when all was going to wreck, la Paliffe freewed himfelf a politician, for he rendered most of the great towns to fuch of the allies as had the least title to, and could reap the least benefit from them, in hopes that this measure would divide them amongst themselves, as it actually did, though not time enough to be of any great fervice to the French<sup>m</sup>.

into Picardy; and Ferdinand the Catholic was to attack Guienne and Languedoc. Lewis, in the mean time, 'had regained the Venetians, in hopes, by their affiftance, to recover the duchy of Milan; and, by agreeing to abandon Navarre, he quieted Ferdinand, and had leifure to act on that fide. Lewis de la Tremouille, the ableft officer in his fervice, marched at the head of fixteen thousand foot, two thousand men at arms, and fix thousand light horse, to relieve the citadel of Milan, a fervice which he performed, and in a fhort time recovered the whole duchy, excepting only Novara and Como. Into the first of these places Francis Sforza, the brother and fucceffor of Maximilian, entered, with a body of fix thousand Swifs. Is appeared the fhortest way to end the war to befiege this place, which Tremouille accordingly invefted with all his forces. The place was on the point of furrendering, when a nu-merous army of Swifs marched to its relief. The French genera's, after mature deliberation, refolved that, as the adjacent country was flat, la Tremouille should remain in his lines with his infantry, and marshal Trivulce, at the head of the cavalry, fhould march to ftop the progrefs of the enemy P. The measure was right; but as Trivulce did not give into it, he drew his horfe into a morafs; a motion which gave the Swifs both within and without the town an opportunity of putting the French foot between two fires, and, in the fight of their horfe, who could not ftir to their affiftance, cutting them to pieces. In the space of a week Francis Sforza recovered the whole duchy: the French were completely expelled out of Milan 9, and foon found fo much employment at home, as, for the prefent, prevented all thoughts of return.

Henry VIII. invades France. takes Terouenne and Tournay, and returns into England. The concerns of France were, in a manner, become defperate of a fudden; for if the allies had executed their engagements, purfuant to the' treaty they concluded at Mechlin, Lewis the Twelfth would have found himfelf in a very diftreffed fituation, as may be eafily gathered from the rifks to which his affairs were expoled, even from the different manner in which they were executed. As for Leo the Tenth, he had ambition, and he was not firaitlaced in point of religion; but he had no malice to the French nation, nor any prejudice to the perfon of the king ; 'and therefore, upon his abandoning the council of Pifa, now transferred to Lyons, and fome few other conceffions of lefs confequence, the pope confented to a reconciliation, which was highly acceptable to the queen, who had ever been in terrors about this war*. Julius the Second, amongst other threats, had given out that he would cancel her marriage, and very probably would have done it, if the queen had not been always on his fide. This accommodation with Rome put an end to all apprehenhons on the fide of Dauphine, which, in truth, were not very great t. The emperor Maximilian had received a fublidy from England of one hundred thousand crowns, for an invalion, which, probably, he never intended to make. Henry the Eighth, who had little or no caufe for entering into the war, and who, notwithstanding, was at almost the whole expence of it, prepared to fulfil his engagements both by land and fea". He landed in the month of July at Calais, and very speedily formed an army of thirty thousand men. He was joined by the emperor with a good corps of horfe, and fome foot; but his bufinefs was only to excufe his not having executed what he undertook to execute by his treaty of fubfidy, for here he did not pretend to ferve as the ally or auxiliary, but as the mercenary, of Henry, who affigned him his quarters, and allowed him an hundred ducats a day for his table : a circumstance which fusiciently explains the vanity of one of those princes, and the fordid temper of the other w. The first enterprize they undertook, was the fiege of Terouenne, which they invefted with an army of upwards of fifty thousand men. The place was ftrong and well defended, fo that when the enemy had lain before it fome time, the duke de Longueville marched to its relief with a numerous army, and fucceeded in the attempt; but, being unfortunately attacked in his retreat, the cavalry fell into a precipitate flight, the duke and a few of his principal officers excepted, who were made prifoners. This action happened on the 18th of August, and was styled by the French La Journée des Eperons, or, the Battle of the Spurs*. On the 24th the place furrendered, after two months fiege, and the allies, not agreeing who fnould keep it, it was difmantled and burnt. Henry then marched, at the emperor's requeft, into the Low Countries, and belieged Tournay, a place of large extent, which might have made a good defence, but the inhabitants, confident of their own ftrength, refused a parrifon, and yet thought fit to furrender in a few days. This city. though lefs convenient for him than Ferouenne, Henry refolved to keep : having directed fome additional fortifications, and left in it a ftrong garrifon, he put an end to the campaigh, and returned into his own dominions in triumph.

The king was the lefs in a condition to defend his terriinvaced by tories against the English, as the Swifs, elevated by the victory they had gained at Novara, made an irruption into Burgundy with twenty-five thousand men, and were joined, on the part of the emperor, by Ulrick duke of Wirtemberg, who brough with him the gentry of Franche Comté, and fome artillery y. These new invaders be-Ecots kulled. fieged Dijon, the capital of the province, into which Lewis de la Tremouille had thrown himfelf with three or four thousand men. The place being but indifferently fortified, must have been infallibly taken, and then the paffage would have been open to Paris, of which danger fome of the richer citizens were fo fenfible, that they began to retire. At the beginning of the fiege la Tremouille made a brifk fally with almost his whole force, which was thought very imprudent; but having taken fome Swifs officers prifoners, he entertained them at his own table, treated them kindly, and enquired what were the fources of this enmity between nations, whole interest it was to be conftantly allied. This difcourfe produced a negociation, in which the Swifs claimed four hundred thousand livres, as the arrears of their penfions; infifted on the king's renouncing all claim to the duchy of Milan, and allo upon fubmitting the king's title to Burgundy to the determina-A.D.1513. tion of experienced lawyers. All this la Tremouille admitted to be reafonable, and undertook should be complied with; giving his own nephew, one of his principal officers, and four of the best citizens of Dijon, as holtages, and twenty thousand crowns by way of earnest; upon which they raifed the fiege and retired. The king difavowed the treaty as difhonourable, and refufed to perform it : but, neverthelefs, it was univerfally acknowleged, that la Tremouille had faved France, and the hoftages were afterwards difengaged for a confiderable fum. The Englith and French fleets had two engagements at fea; in the laft Sir Edward Howard, high admiral of England, was blown up, and Profmoguer, a native of Bretagne, who commanded the French fleet, was likewife flain; but the latter had the advantage, as appeared by their making a descent on the coast of Suffex. The allies of France, in the course of this year, were as unfortunate as the French. The Venetians were defeated by the Spaniards with great lois, and Janies the Fourth of Scotland, who invaded England with a potent army, was defeated and killed by the earl of Surrey, in the fatal battle of Flodden, which was confidered as a grievous misfortune in France, as no farther diversion was to be hoped for on that fide, during the war z.

In the beginning of the year, the queen died, equally On the regretted by the king her hufband and by her fubjects 2; death of and yet her death proved an advantage to the ftate. The his queen, pope, who had vaft defigns for his own family, was equal- Lewis ly defirous of excluding the French and Spaniards from Italy, and with this view laboured to reconcile the emperor England, to the Venetians, and king Lewis with the Swifs, which and marhe knew could not be done but by renouncing his claim ries the to the duchy of Milan : but the king, though much in- filer of clined to peace, had other views, and knew how to nego- vill. ciate fo as to obtain them. predeceffor, when he was only protected by a duke of Bretagne . The news of thefe negociations was not well received at Rome, and much lefs fo at London, where Henry made no fcruple of declaring how little he was pleafed with the conduct of the emperor, and how much he refented the double dealing of his father-in-law Ferdi. nand. But that which piqued him most was, that his fifter Mary, for whom he had a real affection, was flighted by Charles of Auftria, for a younger daughter of France. The duke of Longueville, then prifoner in England, but at the fame time well received at court, took advantage of the temper the king was in to fuggeft that the king his mafter was a widower, in the fifty-fourth year of his age, and that the princefs might be as well married to him as to a prince of Spain. Henry entertained the motion, which was not difapproved by Lewis. A fuspension of arms immediately followed, and a treaty was quickly concluded, by which Tournay was left to the English; Henry was to have a million of crowns; and Lewis was left at liberty to profecute his intentions in Italy, even against the allies of England, without prejudice to the peace, which was at the fame time an alliance offenfive and defenfive between the two crowns. This treaty was figned on the 7th of August, and ratified by both monarchs on the 20th of the fame month d.

Queen Mary arrives in France, is received with all toffible mognififouce. It is hinted by fome hiftorians, and not without great appearance of truth, that one of the principal motives which determined Henry to this peace was to be rid of Richard de la Pole duke of Suffolk, who, with a body of twelve thousand German mercenaries, was on the point of making a defcent in England<sup>e</sup>. Richard the Third had declared this family heirs to the crown. Henry the Seventh left the elder brother of Richard prifoner in the Tower of London; whom at the time he made his laft expedition, Henry the Eighth caufed to be put to death: a circumflance which thews that he was apprehenfive that the warm affection the Englifh nation had for the house of York was far from being extinguished<sup>f</sup>. At least it is certain that Lewis made another use of the German troops that were to have been employed in the invation; and advifed Richard de la Pole to retire to Metz, where he gave him an annual penfion of fix thousand livres. The princess Mary paffed the feas with all poffible pomp and fplendor, and, on the oth of October, the marriage was celebrated at Abbeville. On the 6th of November following, their majefties made their public entry into Paris, amidit the univerfal acclamations of their jubjects. In the midft of the pompous diversions which were made for the reception of the new queen, the king was far from neglecting public affairs. Charles duke of Bourbon, at the head of a numerous body of gens d'arms, advanced to the frontiers towards Italy, and was to be followed by fixteen thoufand German foot, which the king had taken into his pay 8. But in the mean time the caltle of the lanthorn at Genoa, the only place France retained of all her conquefts in Italy, was obliged to furrender, the garrifon being abfolutely deftitute of provisions; and the Genoefe were no fooner in poffellion of it, than they demolished it to its very foundation. The king was very defirous of engaging the pope in his interest, and, on the other hand, Leo made use of every art to hide his true defign, which was to preferve the duchy of Milan for the family of Sforza; to maintain his own family in Tufcany; and to procure for them, if poffible, the kingdom of Naples; fo that none but Italian princes fhould rule in Italy. These schemes of his were conducted with all the fecrecy and addrefs imaginable, and he omitted nothing that was requifite to keep fair with both crowns, who, notwithstanding, had their fuspicions of what was his true defign h.

Lewis, after having extricated himfelf from fo many Death and difficulties, and brought his affairs into fo good order, character whilft he meditated yet greater things, found his infirmities increase, and his health decay. His conftitution was much broken by the gout, against which his only preterfative was a very regular manner of living. He thought himfelf obliged to depart from this, in complaifance to his young queen; and his affection for the most sprightly and the most beautiful young princess in Europe, hastened him to his grave 1. He died in the night following, the first of January, in the fifty-fourth year of his age, and in the feventeenth year of his reign (B). Perfection is not to be found in mortals, and those are justly effeemed flatterers who afcribe it to kings; but the French historians unanimoufly agree, that more royal virtues, with fewer defects, were never more confpicuous in any of their princes than in Lewis the Twelfth. France, fay they, was never more happy, more rich, more quiet, or more fubmiffive, than under his reign. Justice was never better administered; wifer laws were never made, and hardly ever fo well executed. Military difcipline was never to exact, or fo fevere, but, at the fame time, the troops were punctually paid. In fucceeding times the quartering of them in provinces was effeemed a grievance, but, in the time of Lewis, it was confidered as an advantage, and the provinces folicited it in that light k. and his court, the populace and the nobility, equally admired him, and unanimoully called him their Father, the title with which he was most pleafed, and which he made it the fludy of his life to deferve. He began his reign with abolifhing impolitions; and at the time of his death he had diminished above half of them. He was obliged fometimes to raife extraordinary taxes; but when he figned edicts for that purpofe, he did it with tears'. His very misfortunes endeared him to his fubiects; for he might have maintained his conquefts in Italy, if he would have raifed large fums upon his people; but he thought any lofs light when compared with that of their affectious. He was thought a little too faving; and, in the beginning of his reign, his fubjects took the liberty of expressing this in fatires, and even of ridiculing it on the ftage. The king knew it very well, and, which was fingular, it gave him no offence : he faid, upon that occasion, what ought to be ever remembered, " I had much rather my fubjects fhould laugh at my parfimony, than weep at their own diftrefs "." The cuftom in France then was for the criers to proclaim the demife of perfons of all ranks, as they did his in these words; " The good king Lewis, the father of his people, is dead ":" at once the most artlefs and the most finished panegyric.

The Reign of Francis I. Henry II. Francis II. Charles IX. and Henry III. in whom the Branch of Valois was entirely extinguished.

Francis I. furnamed the Patron of Learning.

Accession of the count of Angoulesme. THE widow of the deceafed king having declared that fhe was not pregnant, Francis count of Angoulefme, duke of Bretagne and Valois, fucceeded, without difpute or delay. He was crowned at Rheims on the 25th of January; and his acceflion appeared highly acceptable to all ranks of people; but to the nobility more efpecially, who, having lived with him in great familiarity, expected to fhare deeply in his favours. The two first offices in the ftate were vacant, those of chancellor and conftable ; he beftowed the former upon Anthony du Prat, and the latter on Charles duke of Bourbon *. He took great pains to renew the treaties then fublifting, particularly with the Venetians and the crown of England. He made also a new treaty with the archduke Charles king of Caftile, with whom he affected to contract a ftrict and inviolable friendship b. By this treaty the marriage between that prince and the younger daughter of the deceafed king was again confirmed, though without any intention of performing it, but merely to prevent the reviving any propofitions in refpect to the queen-dowager of France; and it may be, that, to free himfelf effectually from all fears of this kind; the king promoted her marriage with Charles Brandon, duke of Suffolk . Arthur de Gouffier, whom he made great mafter of his houfhold, and his fecretary Florimond de Robertet, had a great share in the government; he communicated to them chiefly his defigns, though he was not very apt to take counfel of any. He was, from his acceffion, determined to purfue his predeceffor's fcheme for the recovery of Milan; which, belonging to the houfe of Orleans, as defcendants from the duchefs Valentine, they had always more at heart than any other part of their dominions : but he kept his fecret well; fo that it was not difclofed till he was on the point of carrying it into execution (A). This defign requiring immente fums of money, and his coffers being abtolutely empty, he had recourfe to du Prat, who was his oracle upon fuch occasions. The chancellor told him that his predecellor had fold offices, and advifed him to use the fame means; upon which he added a chamber to the parliament of Paris, and to each of the other parliaments. which was one of the first and one of the worst strokes of this ministry's policy d. In the beginning of his reign, Lewis the Twelfth had fold fome offices, but none that were judicial, and purely with a view to avoid loading his people with taxes; whereas Francis had already raifed them as high as his predeceffor had found them. Befides, as foon as it was in his power, Lewis repurchased and fuppreffed those offices; and, rather than have recourse to this expedient again, alienated part of his domain, which fufficiently flews the disposition of a minister who could mention this as a precedent.

. This treafure, thus supplied, was very speedily expend- Passerthe ed. The new duke of Genoa, Fregofa, was prevailed Alpsinto upon to depose himself, and to accept the title of perpe- lialy with tual governor, under the crown of France. Don Pedro a potent Novara, who was made prifoner in the battle of Ravenna, piqued at the little notice that had been taken of him, entered into the fervice of France, and found means to raite ten thousand Biscaneers and Gascons. The duke of Guelders brought many thousands of Landsquenets out of

(A) The defcent of the house of Angoulesme was very clear, being a branch of that of Orleans. John count of Angoaleline was the fifth fon of Lewis of France, who was affaffinated by order of the duke of Burgundy. This John was furnamed the Good, and lived near thirty years in England, where he was a hoftage. He espoufed Margaret, daughter to Alain count of Rohan, by whom he had Lewis, who died in his infancy, Charles who fucceeded him, and Joan, who married the prince of Mortagne. He espoufed Louifa of Savoy, the eldeft daughter of Philip count of Breffe, and atterwards duke of Savoy. This princefs was extremely beautitul, and had infinite wit; but, at the fame time, had most of the foibles of her fex. She was gallant, vindictive, cunning, protufe, and vain. He had by her only two children, Francis, who fucceeded to the crown, and his fifter Margaret.

Germany; fo that, when the army was affembled, in order to pafs the Alps, it was the most numerous that France had ever raifed in this quarrel, confifting of forty thoufand foot and twenty thousand horse. The king having raifed his own county of Angoulesme into a duchy, beflowed it upon his mother Louisa of Savoy, and declared her regent ° in his abfence : and this princefs was the first to whom the French gave the title of Madame. All things being ready by the beginning of August, the troops began to attempt the paffage of the Alps, by a new road, made with incredible labour, and at a vait expence, at Roque-Perriere, the Swifs having fecured all that they thought practicable. The vanguard was commanded by the conftable, the main body by the king in perfon, who had with him, belides feveral princes of the blood, the dukes of Gueldres, Lorrain, and Savoy; the duke of Alencon commanded the rear f. The first stroke of importance was furprifing Profper Colonna, the pope's general, with three hundred men at arms; upon which Leo immediately fent one of his minifters, with full powers to treat of an accommodation; and the Swifs, perceiving it to no purpole to guard them longer, abandoned the paffe. 5. They continued, however, to march close by the king's army, fully refolved to attack it the first fair opportunity. Yet, by the interpolition of the duke of Savoy, they were brought to a negotiation; and by a treaty concluded at Guilletres it was flipulated, that the king fhould give them feven hundred thoufand crowns, in full fatisfaction of all their demands. To raife which enormous fum, Francis was conftrained to borrow not only all the money but all the plate alfo belonging to the princes and great officers. Such was the terror they had at this time, and not without reason, of the Swifs troops h; and fo defirous were the king and his general to recover their favour.

Defeats the Swifs at Marignano.

But the Swifs, receiving at this juncture a confiderable reinforcement, under the command of captain Rofs, and being perfuaded by the vehement harangues of the cardinal of Sion, refolved to attack the king in his camp, though they were forfaken by the pope's troops, and were without artillery. ber, about four in the afternoon, they attacked the French camp at Mariguano, within a quarter of a league of Milan, with amazing intrepidity. The action lafted for feveral hours after fun-fet, and ended then becaufe both parties were fo fatigued that they were unable to maintain the fight. The king himfelf flept an hour upon the carriage of a cannon, in the midft of the enemy; and as foon as he waked, gave orders for pofting his artillery, and making all the neceffary dispositions for renewing the fight 1. Accordingly, as foon as day broke, the Swifs returned to the charge, with greater fury than the day before, but were fo extremely galled by the cannon, and fo miferably broken by the gens d'arms, who charged through them, that about nine they began their retreat, leaving near one half of their army, which confifted of twentyfive thousand men, upon the field. This retreat gained them more reputation than all their victories, for they made it flowly and in good order, and repulfed a corps of Venetian troops, which ventured to purfue them. Marfhal Trivulce faid, that eighteen battles, in which he ferved before, were but children's play in comparison of this, which he flyled the fight of the giants. But the victory, glorious as it was, coft the French four thousand of their best troops, and several perfons of distinction. Don D.A.1515. Pedro Navarro reduced Novara; the city of Milan opened her gates ; the conftable befieged the citadel, and took it by capitulation; Francis Sforza refigned his dukedom to the king, in confideration of a penfion of fixty thousand ducats, and the promife of a cardinal's hat, thinking himfelf happy in being delivered from the heavy yoke of the Germans, the furly humours of the Swifs, and the crafty contrivances of the Spaniards k. The king made a triumphal entry into Milan; established a parliament there after the model of that of Paris; appointed the conftable governor of the city and duchy, and left with him a corps of ten thousand men 1. The pope having accepted a peace on fuch terms as the king prefcribed, Francis had an interview with him at Bologna, where, to prevent a fchifm, he confented to the concordat; and, having thus glorioufly terminated his affairs in Italy, returned into his own dominions, after refußing the title of emperor of the ed to render Navarre in fix months, and confented, in cafe he failed, that the king fhould affift the house of Albret with an army. The true motive to this treaty was his concern for the fecurity of the Low Countries 9. The emperor Maximilian acceded to it : for the fum of two hundred thousand crowns in ready money, and the difcharge of three hundred thousand more, which he had borrowed of the late king, he promifed to deliver up Verona, and to grant the king the investiture of the duchy of Milan . The five protesting cantons now acceded to the treaty of Friburgh, fince that time ftyled the perpetual alliance, having fublifted ever fince between the two nations, and proved reciprocally advantageous to both.

With respect to the investiture, Maximilian cure his took time to confider, which was his manner of refufing. The duchy of Urbino was conquered for Laurence de Medicis, who, being in France, confirmed the alliance with his uncle Leo the Tenth . About the fame time Francis renewed the ancient treaties between France and Scotland, and fent over the duke of Albany to administer the government in the name of the young king, or, in other words, to render that country a province of France, a ftep which was highly displeasing to Henry the Eighth, the young king's uncle, who had very kind intentions towards that prince '. The parliaments and the univerfities of France were unanimous in their opposition to the concordat; but the king, to gain the favour of the pope, caufed it to be introduced and executed by force "; facrificing to the pleafure of a foreign prince the laws of his country, and the affections of his fubjects. The birth of a dauphin gave great pleafure to the king mages fo and to his fubjects. The pope promifed to answer for the young prince at the font, and accordingly Laurence de Medicis performed that ceremony in his name, which was one of the arts he used to preferve the good opinion of the king, while he was fecretly doing him ill offices, and concerting, or at least endeavouring to concert, a league for depriving him of his duchy of Milan. On the other hand, Francis still persisted in his defire of reviving his claim to the kingdom of Naples, which induced him to heap favours upon the pope, in hopes that he might gradually win and fix him to his intereft. With this view. as he had already very unjuftly fettied Laurence de Medicis in the duchy of Urbino, fo he next gave him in marriage Magdalen of Bologne, niece to the duke of Vendofme, a great heirefs". From this marriage fprung Catherine de Medicis, of whom we shall have much to fay hereafter. He was still very diffident of England, and with reafon; for he flood at that time upon ill terms with cardinal Wolfey (who, with the title of his minister, governed Henry the Eighth as abfolutely as if he had been his pupil), though he was in fome meafure indebted to him for his hat. Wolfey had influenced Henry to fhew fuch marks of jealoufy, as obliged the French monarch to leave Italy fooner than he intended; he had likewife prevailed upon him to furnish the emperor with money for his late Italian expedition: but perceiving that, as things were then circumflanced, it would be impoffible to raife a war in Europe, he made fome advances towards a reconciliation with Francis, who, being perfectly acquainted with his character, made him very rich prefents, and confulted him upon points of great importance *. The point on which they had differed, was in respect to the fee of Tournay, of which he had the administration and revenue, but was defirous likewife of having the title, which the king had not only refused, but had alfo folicited the pope to reftore the administration to the deprived bifhop. who was his fubject. But now he treated with Wolfey for the reftitution of the city, with a promife to indemnify him amply for the particular lofs which he might fuftain. The point being once fettled with the minister, the admiral of France, with other perfons of great diffinction, came over as ambaffadors to fettle it with the king. The cardinal managed this affair with great addrefs : he fold the town at a very high price; but, that his new client might have no reafon to complain, he flipulated a marriage between the dauphin, just born, and the king's only daughter Mary, to whom he affigned a large portion, and confented that it should be abated out of the purchase r. On the figning of this treaty on the 14th of October. king Francis, by his letters patent, granted the cardinal an annuity of fourteen thousand livres. The king was fo A D.15 well pleafed with this bargain, that he proposed dealing for Calais, and Wolfey entertained the motion, and in all probability would have brought it to bear; but Charles, king of Caftile, interpofed, and made him fensible that he was well inclined to repurchafe his good graces, an intimation which flopped that bargain 2. The princefs Louifa being dead, Charles, king of Caffile, ftill inclined to foothe the monarch of France, renewed the treaty of Nojon, and promifed to efpouse the princess Charlotte, who was just born, and, having the fame intentions as to both. it was of little confequence.

In purfuance of the late treaty with England, monfieur Charles Colligni took poffession of Tournay, which, exclusive of carriest the prefents and penfions to cardinal Wolfey, cost king imperial Francis at leaft four hundred thousand crowns. How- crown ever, the two kings were ftill upon fo good terms, that from Fra Henry was godfather to the king's fecond fon, and gave which him his own name 2. tain money; for his real intention was in favour of his younger grandfon Ferdinand, till, upon more mature deliberation, he thought it more expedient to prefer Charles; and, on his behalf, therefore, he was labouring with the electors at the very time he died. Francis, though he had refused the title of emperor of the East, was not fo indifferent as to the empire of Germany; but, on the contrary, very ambitious of reftoring that title to the monarchs of France; and, as he was very generous, or rather profuse, he found it no difficult matter to obtain promises from the electors b. The pope pretended fometimes to be neuter; at other times he affected to favour France; but, in reality, he was not defirous that either Charles or Francis should be chosen, he would have prevailed to the exclusion of both, if the duke of Saxony would have accepted the imperial crown. But he refusing it, the electors, after much confideration, bestowed it on Charles . As one great reafon of their preferring him to Francis, was, their apprehension of feeing themselves reduced from the rank of princes to that of nobility, like those of France, they refolved to limit the power of their new mafter, and with this view fettled the capitulation, which he was to accept, at the fame time he was admitted to the imperial dignity. A circumftance to which, in all probability, he would not have fubmitted, but from the apprehenfion of A.D. 1519. being fupplanted by Francis. This controverfy was carried on with all the exterior marks of politenefs poffible between the competitors; but, notwithstanding, Francis was fo much piqued at this difappointment, that it was the real fource of that inveterate averfion, which, however difguifed upon particular occasions, those monarchs bore to each other ever after. It immediately revived the old project of recovering the kingdom of Naples, which feemed to be facilitated by the opinion, that it was incompati-

Camp de Drap d'Or, or, the Camp of Gold Cloth; it lasted ten or twelve days, exhaufted the treasures of both monarchs, ruined many of their nobility, and anfwered no end whatever d. Before this interview, the new emperor, palling out of Spain to the Low Countries, had landed at Dover, and made fuch impressions on Wolfey, as in a great measure frustrated the aims of Francis. While A.D.1520. Charles was receiving the enfigns of the Imperial dignity at Aix la Chapelle, and thought himfelf fecure of the pope, who had promifed to take no advantage of his acceffion to the imperial diadem, fuppofed to include the ceffion of that of Naples, Francis began to treat with him, as if the forfeiture of Charles's title to that crown was a point inconteftible. In a little time he concluded an alliance, by which Leo undertook to refuse the investiture to Charles, and to grant it to Francis as foon as he should be in possession, not, however, in favour of himself, but of his fecond fon Henry, upon condition that Gaeta and a large tract of country fhould be granted to the fee of Rome; and that, during the minority of the young prince, the whole realm fhould be governed by an apostolic legate. Upon the faith of this treaty, Francis began to make his preparations, and to take his measures .

As the king could never have a more favourable oppor- Francis tunity than was afforded him by the infurrection of the caufes the king dom of commons of Castile for the recovery of Navarre, he di-Navarre rected a confiderable body of troops to be affembled for to be conthat purpofe, under the command of Andrew de Foix, quered, which is fieur de Esparre, the brother of monfieur de Lautrec and loft again the countefs de Chateaubrian. As the country was enfoon after. tirely open, after reducing St. Jean de Pie de Port, that officer met with no farther refiftance till he reached Pampeluna, which, together with the citadel, he reduced, after a fhort fiege. It is certain, that, if he had been content with doing all that he was ordered to do, and had bent his thoughts entirely on the keeping of what he had got, the house of Austria would have been deprived of Navarre<sup>f</sup>. But being defirous to do more, he undid all that he had done. On his befieging Logrogno, the nobility of Caftile took up arms, and obliged him to raife the fiege. Yet he afterwards fought this army within a league of Pampeluna, without flaying for a reinforcement of fix thousand men, which were in full march towards him; and being defeated and taken prifoner, Pampeluna and the reft of the kingdom was loft, much fooner than they were won 8. At the time that the fiame of war feemed to be extinguished on this fide, it was kindled again on that of the Low Countries, by a very flight occasion, which, in reality, was not fo much the caufe of the war, as a proof that thefe two great princes were determined to feize the first opportunity of employing the whole force of their extensive dominions in expressing the inveteracy of their mutual refentment.

Some years before, the fieur d'Aimeres and the prince de Chimay had a law-fuit for the town of Hierge, in the Charles and Ardennes, which had been determined by the peers of the duchy of Bouillon in favour of the prince of Chimay. The fieur d'Aimeres had lent the emperor a very confiderable fum of money, during the diet of Francfort, which had been very ufeful in the great, affair of his election; and, instead of being repayed this money, he was allowed to appeal from the old fentence to the fovereign council at Brabant, who prefently fummoned the children of the prince of Chimay to appear before their tribunal. This citation inflamed Robert de la Marck, duke de Bouillon, who was guardian to the children of the prince of Chimay, and had married their aunt, not only for their fakes, but becaufe it attacked the fovereignty of his duchy, which, though fmall, he affirmed to be as much a fovereignty, and as independent as any other. His brother Erard de la Marck, bishop of Liege, had been formerly strongly attached to France, and Robert himfelf had been likewife in that fervice; but madame d'Angoulefme, the king's mother, having difappointed the bifhop of a hat, becaufe the had received a prefent of fifty thoufand crowns to procure it for another, both the bifhop and the duke went over to the Spanish interest, and had contributed not a little to the emperor's election. This circumftance aggravated, in their opinion, the ill ufage they had met with; they therefore reconciled themfelves immediately to France; and Robert carried it fo far, as to go in perfon to demand the protection of king Francis. The king, having affured him of it in ftrong terms, and having probably made him a confiderable prefent, he began immediately to levy troops, having affembled between four and five thousand men, he made an irruption into the duchy of Luxemburgh, and fent a herald to declare

Charles, upon this occasion, fent an ambaffador to expostulate the matter with the king, and another to complain to king Henry of England, as the common umpire between them, of the high infult he had received; but these measures producing no effect, he sent an army, under the command of Henry count of Naffau, to take vengeance of Robert de la Marck.

It was this army that began the war, by reducing Mou- The long fon ; but they failed of taking Mezicres, which was de- war begun fended by the chevalier Bayard : on the other hand, the advantage French took Hefdin, and fome other places. King Fran- on the fide cis marched with his army directly to Valenciennes, where of Flanthe emperor lay with his, and, having paffed the Schelde, ders, and offered him battle, but the emperor retired; and, if the contlable of Bourbon's advice had been followed, in all probability would have fuffered a defeat. But the king, prejudiced against him by his mother, rejected the propofition, and gave the command of his van-guard to the duke of Alencon, who had married his fifter, a ftep which was not only an affiont to the conftable, but derogatory to the rights of his office i. All this time the Imperial and French ministers were debating their cause before Henry at Calais, where, at length, a project of a peace was figned, fatisfactory to both parties. But the news arriving that admiral Bonivet had taken Fontarabia, the Imperialifts would hear of nothing unlefs this city was reftored. If the admiral had followed his inftructions, there would have been no room for any difpute, fince he was directed to demolish the place as foon as he was master of it; but he was fo fond of his new conqueft, and had fuch an afcendancy over the mind of his mafter, that the reftitution of it was rejected, which cost France a war of thirty-eight years, and fuch an expence of blood and treafure, as brought her to the very brink of destruction k. Before the A.D.1521. end of the campaign the emperor reduced Tournay 1. In Italy, all things took a wrong turn : pope Leo, after embarraffing the French by his intrigues, at length declared openly against them, and joined his troops to those of the Imperialists, in order to reftore Francis Sforza to the duchy of Milan. into a belief that it would be fent after him. But the profusion of the king and his mother abforbed all that was produced by the funds affigned for that purpofe; fo that for want of pay the Swifs deferted, and the greateft part of the duchy, and even the city of Milan, fell into the hands of the enemy. The joy conceived at this extraordinary fuccefs, and the profpect of feeing the French driven out of Italy in another campaign, fo hurried the fpirits of Leo the Tenth, that he fell into a fever, of which he died. His death might have been of great advantage to the French in Italy, if thofe who commanded their forces in that country had been in a condition to improve any advantage<sup>m</sup>. But, through the intrigues then reigning at court, this was not to be done.

More misfortunes which produce inquiries, and thefe, inflead of remedies, acts of injuflice.

The forces of the pope, the emperor, and the duke of Milan, commanded by Prosper Colonna, were by their fucceffes become inferior to those of the viscount de Lautree, who had been joined by a large body of Swifs, and, therefore, Prosper, to avoid a battle, had intrenched himfelf at Bicoque, which was an old country feat, with a park and gardens well walled and fenced. Here he entrenched himfelf ftrongly; but, in all probability, he muft have been forced to furrender with his whole army, if Lautree had been fuffered to purfue his own fcheme of cutting off his provisions, and preventing their retreat." But the Swifs, confiding in their numbers and courage, infifted that the French general fhould either give them their pay, or put an end to the campaign, by attacking the enemy in their posts. As he had no money, he was obliged to comply with the other part of the alternative. He accordingly attempted to force the enemy in their lines, which attempt, though executed with all the bravery imaginable, yet terminated in the loss of the best officers in his army, and about three thoufand Swifs, who, being much difpirited, left him, and retired into their own country ". Profper Colonna, having recovered the fuperiority, pushed the French fo effectually, that, before the close of the campaign, the citadel of Milan, Novara, Pifighitone, and the caftle of Genoa, for the city was furprised, were all the French had left °. The news of these misfortunes made a strong impression on the French court, and occasioned an enquiry into their caufes. Lautree infifted, that his not being fupplied with money, according to the affurances he had received, was the fole fource of all this misfortune. Upon this remonstrance, De Baune Semblanfai, who had the direction of the finances, was called upon to know what became of the money. He alleged, and very truly, that madame d'Angoulesme, the king's mother, had received it, and appealed to acquittances, which fhe had given him for it. But those acquittances were not to be found; Gentil. who was his deputy, and who had an amour with one of the duchefs's ladies of honour, had ftolen and deli-vered them up. This circumftance drew the procefs into a great length; but, in the end, De Baune Semblanfai, an honeft venerable old man, whom the king him. felf had not been ashamed to ftyle Father, was hanged as a public plunderer, and a falle accuser P. Gentil, for his good fervice, was promoted to be prefident of parliament; but, in the end, met with the punishment due to his perfidy. These proceedings did not at all contribute to reftore the face of affairs, which, on the contrary, grew every day worfe and worfe 9, through the unbounded progress of corruption.

At this time cardinal Wolfey was entirely at the de- Henry votion of the emperor Charles, who replaced the great VIII. being pensions given him by Francis, and many confiderable folicited for prefents befides; in order to merit which, he induced inflead of his mafter to act a very extraordinary part. The king found himfelf fo exceedingly diffreffed for money, that, by the advice of chancellor du Prat, he had recourse to the most deftructive methods of raifing it, fuch as mortgaging his

The confable Bourbon leaves enters into the emperor's fervice.

The Spaniards had blocked up Fontarabia, from the time it had fallen into the hands of the French, and France and James Daillon fieur de Lude, had defended it with great fpirit and fuccefs for near a year, till the marshal de Chabannes arrived with an army and conftrained the enemy to raife the fiege. This event revived the credit of the king's arms; and his affairs might have taken a more favourable turn, if his mother, the duchefs of Angoulefme, who had hitherto perfecuted the conftable, by drawing on him continual mortifications, had not changed her battery, and commenced a fuit against him for his whole eftate, which was, in all refpects, the most confiderable that any fubject poffeffed in France'. The constable was a perfon of great abilities, determined courage, of a high fpirit, ftrong refentment, and had very great connections. When, therefore, he faw his ruin determined, he entered into a correspondence with the emperor, the king of England, and the reft of the confederates; and finding this difcovered, retired privately, and went into the emperor's fervice "(C). (C) The death of Sufanna, duchefs of Bourbon, April, 28, 1521, at the age of thirty, opened the way to those troubles, which compelled, or at least induced the constable to quit his country, and to enter into the fervice of the emperor; an affair of fuch confequence to the French history, that it deferves to be particularly confidered. Madame, the king's mother, was about the age of forty-five, and was fill, at leaft in her own opinion, handfome; the conkable was about two-and-thirty. She caufed it to be infinuated, on the one hand, to Bourbon, what mighty advantages he would reap from the marriage, in cafe he confented to it; and on the other hand, the gave her fon to understand, that fhe had his interest greatly in view, fince, as there was no appearance of iffue by this marriage, the vaft effates of the house of Bourbon, on the death of the constable. defortion of fuch a perfon occasioned a general conflernation; and though there did not immediately happen any conflable, would revert to the Francis, either feccrown. ing the thing in this light, or out of an earnest defire of obliging his mother, preffed the conitable all he could to torget the many mortifications he had received, and to espouse Madame. The conflable not only rejected abiolutely all thele offers, but likewife gave fome difobliging reafons for his diftaste, which the king took highly amifs. The duchefs of Angoulefme being provoked beyond all meafure, and aferibing the conftable's averfion to the infinuations of Anne, - duchefs dowager of Bourbon. his mother in-law. who, notwithftanding, the death of her daughter, without leaving any child living, had confirmed, as far as it was in her power, all the ceffions made in favour of the marriage, refolved to attack the family-fettlements, and ftrip the conitable of his vaft eftates. These contisted chiefly in the duchies of Bourbonnois and Auvergue, and the counties of Montpenfier, Clermont, and Fores, tome of which, it was pretended, reverted to the crown upon the death of Pe ter, duke of Bourbon, the laft heir of the eldeft line : and the reft, in virtue of old familyfettlements, ought to defcend to Madame, as the coufin and heirefs of the late duchefs Sufanna. At the accellion of Lewis the Twelith, this matter had been agitated; the duchefs Anne was inclined to marry her daughter to the duke of Alençon; and, though flie had no great reafon to expect that monarch's favour. whom flic had imprifoned while duke of Orleans, yet, knowing that the beft part of her hufband's eflates would revert to him, the requefted a new grant in favour of that marriage; but the king told her. that Charles, count of Montpenfier, was the heir male of the family; and that, in prudence as well as justice, the ought to give her daughter to him; in which cafe, he was ready to do all that fhe defir ed. Upon this, Sufanna was given to the conftable, then count of Montpenfier, and, by the mariage contract, they made reciprocal renunciations of their respective rights in favour of each other, and to the longer liver : it was the ceffion of Lewis the Twelfth that was attacked as prejudicial to the crown, and this marriage contract as inconfiftent with the old family-fettlements. All writers agree, that the duchefs of Angou. lefme's pretentions were unfounded ; however, after a long procets, her influence was fo great, that fhe obtained from the parliament a fequestration of the lands in question, by which the conftable was to be turned out of poffeffion ; this injury, with the death of his mother-in-law, the duchefs Anne, daughter to Lewis the Eleventh.

any infurrection, as was generally expected, yet it had a very bad influence on affairs, and excited fuch jealoufies, that, for the prefent, the king was forced to fufpend the fending fuccours, as he defigned, into Italy. This delay coft him the few places that were yet held, the commanders of which thought it very excufable to furrender upon tolerable terms, and before they were reduced to fuch diftrefs as fhould put it out of their power to expect any terms at all. At length, when it was in a manner too late, the king refolved to fend a numerous army into Italy, though by this very flep he expofed the reft of his dominions to the moft imminent peril, and his fubjects to diftrefs and danger, even in his capital w.

Eleventh, threw him into defpair, and induced him to fend Adrian de Croi, count de Rieux, to offer his fervices to the emperor, who accepted them with great joy, and fent immediately his fecretary Beaurain to the conftable, to whom he offered his fifter Eleonora, queen-dowager of Portugal, with a portion of two hundred thousand crowns, and to declare her fole heirefs of the house of Austria, in case he himfelf and his brother the archduke Ferdinand should die without iffue. He farther offered to receive him into the league concluded with the king of England, and directed that it should be communicated to him. In the mean time, the king had intelligence in general terms of the intrigue, upon which he took Moulins, where the constable was in his way on his march into Italy. He found him in bed, for he pretended fickness, to avoid attending the king in that expedition; and, having frankly told him what informations he had received, added, that he fuppofed the law-fuit had rendered him a malecontent, and he did not wonder at it; but affured him, that, if the caufe was determined against him, he would reftore him his eftates. The constable made no difficulty of owning that he had treated with the emperor, thanked the king for his kindnefs, and promifed to follow him to Lyons, and began his journey accordingly in a litter, but turned off upon the road ; and, by the affiftance of Pomperant, made his efcape, but with great difficulty, to Trent, of which, as foon as Charles the Fifth had notice, he declared him his lieutenant-general in Italy. The difcovery of his intrigues hindered Francis from going that year, in perfon, into that country, and threw the command into the hands of the admiral Bonivet.

Cardinal

Cardinal Wolfey was exceedingly difpleafed with the While emperor, upon the election of Adrian VI. to the papacy ; France is and could not believe that he, who had been the emperor's attacked on preceptor, and at the very time of his election at the head the king of the administration in Spain, could be chosen, as Charles fends a pretended, without his interpolition or alliftance; how- new army ever, as he was very old, and the emperor ftill continued into Italy. his penfions and affurances, the cardinal perfitted in his plan, entered into the intrigue with the conftable, and concerted a new invation of France, in conjunction with Charles, in both capacities of emperor and king of Spain ; and this was fo well concerted, that it feemed fcarce poffible their defign should miscarry . As emperor, Charles fent a corps of troops through the Franche Compte into Burgundy, where they appeared very unexpectedly, and did a great deal of mifchief; but they were at length compelled to retire, by the prudent conduct of the count de Guife, and by their difappointment in not meeting with the affiftance they expected from the conftable, who, if he could have remained in France till his fchemes had been ripe, without queftion, would have reduced the monarchy as low as it had ever been, even in the days of Charles VII. An English army of about fifteen thousand men, under the command of the duke of Suffolk, landed at Calais, and was quickly joined by the count de Bure, with the like number of the emperor's troops, in quality of duke of Burgundy. The French having no army to oppose them, they made themselves masters of Bray fur Somme, took Mondidier, burnt Roye, and advanced A.D. 1523. within eleven leagues of Paris; but by that time Francis had fent a good body of troops from Lyons, under the command of the duke of Vendofme, upon which the allies retired; and, by the addrefs of monfieur la Tremouille, were obliged to abandon their defign of taking up winterquarters in France. 'The emperor came, in perfon, into the kingdom of Navarre, and caufed his troops to inveft Fontarabia; but fuddenly, as if he had changed his defign, though, in truth, he had only concealed it, ordered his forces to pass the mountains, and belieged Bayonne, into which Lautree had thrown himfelf with a fmall body of troops. The Spaniards attacked it both by land and fea, for four days fucceflively, but without effect ; fo that, after ravaging the adjacent country, they raifed the fiege and retired h. It is true, that the enemies of France were every where difappointed; but it is no lefs true, that France was infulted one very fide, the country ravaged, and the people ruined. The admiral Bonivet, with fifteen hundred men at arms, fix thoufand French foot, as many Lanfquenets, and fifteen thoufand Swifs, entered Italy, recovered fo much of the Milanefe as lies on this fide the Teffin, relieved Cremona, that is, the caftle, the only place that held for them, which, all the officers being dead, was defended by eight private men<sup>1</sup>. By this fuccefs, an eftablifhment was again made, the king's hopes were raifed, and thereby a new fund fettled for producing frefh miferies to that kingdom, which had already fuffered fo often and fo deeply by thefe Italian expeditions.

The defire as well as the need the emperor had of recovering Fontarabia, induced him to fend the conftable of Caffile and the prince of Orange to make an attempt upon it, though they had very little hopes of fucceeding. The name of the governor was Frauget; he had a good garrison, every thing requisite for the defence of the place, and the example of Mr. du Lude, who had defended the place for more than a year without any of these advantages; but being tempted by the offer of good terms, and being a man of no great abilities, for as to his courage it was never suspected, he surrendered the place, for which he was called to an account, and fentenced to be degraded k. In Italy, admiral Bonivet was confirained to act on the defensive, a part which he performed for fome time; but at length, finding himfelf difappointed of the fuccours he expected, feeing most of the places taken into which he had put garrifons, and being conftrained to make the beft retreat he could, his army fuffered extremely : amongft those who fell was Peter du Ferrail, more famous by the title of the chevalier de Bayard, to whom the whole French nation in his life-time, and all hiftorians fince his deceafe, added the epithet, "Sans Peur et fans Reproche," that is, without fear and without reproach. He was one of the worthieft, as well as one of the braveft men of his age, and the ableft officer in France; yet he never role higher than to be captain of a troop of gens d'arms, a circumftance which is afcribed to his great probity, and his defpifing the arts of a court. By the end of April the French army had repassed the mountains, without being able to preferve fo much as a fingle caftle in the Milanefe'. Adrian VI. being dead, cardinal de Medicis was advanced to the fee of Rome m, by the title of Clement VII. and would have laid hold of this opportunity to conclude a neace : with that view he fent his legate into England. where he might have succeeded, if it had not been for Wolfey, who yet did not oppofe it becaufe he difliked the meafure, or thought the conjuncture improper, but becaufe he was refolved the pope should have nothing to do in it, and that he himfelf fhould have the merit of it with king Francis, and the reputation with all Europe.

However, he reprefented for the prefent to his mafter. The kinp's that he had a favourable opportunity of humbling France for ever, by dividing it into two kingdoms, and having, ous urn. at leaft, one of the princes for his feudatory. A treaty upon which accordingly was concluded on this plan, in favour of the he makes a conftable of Bourbon, to whom the king furnished money, the emperor troops, and himfelf the hopes of a great revolt, as foon as he fhould appear with a force fufficient to protect his adherents. His own fcheme was to march directly to Lyons, and thence into the provinces where his eftates lay, fully perfuaded that most of his vaffals would join him. But the emperor, who furnished him both with an army and a fleet, infifted that he should enter Provence and befiege Marfeilles, which he at length confented to do, becaufe he could not do otherwife". He paffed the mountains in the midft of fummer, reduced Antibes, Frejus, Graffe, without a stroke, Brignolles after a short refistance, upon which Aix and Toulon submitted. By the middle of August he appeared before Marfeilles, and belieged it forty days; but when he had made a breach, and commanded the troops to make an affault, they refufed to obey, chiefly through the jealoufy of the marquis of Pefcaro; after all, hearing that the king was in full march to its relief, he was confirained to raife the fiege, and to retire into Italy". If Francis had been content with his good fortune, he might have repaired his past difgraces, and have made an honourable peace. But, being at the head of between thirty and forty thoufand men, and having most of the princes of his blood and the great lords about him, he proposed, by the advice of admiral Bonivet, that they fhould pafs the mountains A.D.1524.

them with all poffible care, the generals of the emperor's army refolved to attack, fure, if they gained a victory, to relieve Pavia, and recover the duchy of Milan; and as fure, if they did not make this attempt, their army would crumble and drop to pieces of itfelf.

On the 24th of February, the feaft of St. Matthias, and the emperor's birth-day, they attacked the caftle and park of Merabel, in which the king's rear guard was posted, under the command of the duke of Alençon, which they thought themfelves fecure of carrying, in cafe the king should not advance to its relief; and if he did, they knew he must lose the advantage of those works which both he and they confidered as impregnable. The armies were pretty equal, and made together near fifty thousand men. What they expected came to pafs, the king no fooner faw his brother attacked and in danger than he marched to his affistance. At the beginning the advantage was on the fide of the French, arifing chiefly from the fevere fire of their artillery, well posted and well ferved ; the Spanish infantry, unable to fuftain it, began to give way. The king, to improve this good fortune, marched to attack them through a hollow way, but, being between them and his batteries, he loft the benefit of his artillery; and the viceroy marching with his gens d'arms, and a good body of foot to fustain them, he was himfelf very foon in great diftrefs. His own horfe failed in their duty; the Swifs, contrary to cuftom, gave way'. The king behaved with great intrepidity. Francis of Lorrain, brother to the duke, and Richard de la Pole, the last of the house of Suffolk, who had brought up the Lanfquenets to his affiftance, were killed by his fide; the admiral de Bonivet had the fame fate, and was not at all regretted; Galeas de St. Severin, mafter of the horfe, and another of the fame name, great mafter of the houshold, were flain at the fame time and in the fame place, where fell alfo the great Lewis de la Tremouille, at the age of feventy-five ; the marshal de Foix, and the Baftard of Savoy, covered with wounds, were taken prifoners, and died in a few days ". The count de St. Pol fell at the king's feet, and was taken up for dead by a Spaniard, who had a mind to a ring upon his finger, which attempting to cut off, he revived, and afterwards recovered. Befides, Henry had for fecurity the cardinal of Bourbon, the dukes of Vendofine and Longueville, the earls of St. Paul, Maulevier, and Bienne; the lords of Montmorency, Lautrec, and Breze, the cities of Paris, Lyons, Orleans, Touloufe, Amiens, Bourdeaux, Tours, and Rheims. the count de Guife, with the duke of Lorrain, had the good fortune, with a handful of troops, to defeat and cut to pieces the German peafants. Let us now return to king Francis in his confinement.

That prince was no fooner taken than the great officers King of the emperor's army began to make their court to him, Francis and were well received. The duke of Bourbon, indeed, found fome difficulty; but at length the king faw and converfed, and, fome writers fay, was reconciled to him . rejected. Amongst them all the marquis de Pescara was the best re- and others ceived; inftead of going as the reft did, in great fplendor, proposed which he he appeared in mourning, affected fo deep a concern, risils, and treated the king with fuch profound refpect, that Francis could not refuse his good graces to this lord, efteemed one of the greatest captains, one of the ablest statesmen, but withal the most artful man in the world d. While in the caftle of Pifighitone, Francis had propofed to the emperor, that, to purchase his liberty, he would renounce all pretentions to the kingdom of Naples, and to the duchy of Milan; relinquish the homage due to him for the counties of Artois and Flanders; concur in reducing under his obedience whatever Charles claimed in Italy; furnish an army and a fleet as often as the emperor should go in that quality into that country; and laftly, as he was now a widower, would efpouse the queen-dowager of Portugal, Charles's elder fifter, accepting the duchy of Burgundy as her dowry, which fhould pafs to the children of that marriage . These propositions were fcornfully rejected by the emperor, who treated the titles to Milan and Naples with contempt; infinuated that he flood in no need of the king's affiltance; and infifted that he could not confider as a ranfom, yielding those things to which he had an inconteffible right. On the other hand, the terms he proposed were, that Francis should make a ceffion of the duchy of Burgundy, purely and fimply; give Dauphiné, Provence, and the Lyonnois to the duke of Bourbon, without the refervation of any homage, to be erected into a kingdom, and make fatisfaction to the English; to which Francis answered, he would first die in a prifon f. In the mean time there appeared no fmall difficulty in keeping him there. The princes of Italy began to cabal for his deliverance; and if the pope had not been frightened into paying the Imperialists money, but, on the contrary, had employed it in levying Swifs troops, the face of affairs would have been quickly changed. To carry him from Genoa to Naples by fea was unfafe, becaufe of the French fleet ; to carry him by land more difficult, fince the princes of Italy might eafily have refcued him : but the viceroy Lannoy removed all thefe obftacles, by perfuading them to make it his own choice to go to Spain on board his own gallies, manned by Spaniards, on a fuppofition that, when he came to treat directly with the emperor, face to face, all difficulties would be removed. This was done in the midft of June; but at his arrival in Spain he found himfelf miferably deceived, in being confined in the caftle of Madrid, without fo much as feeing the emperor ; at length, falling fick of grief, the emperor fearing to lofe all by his death, went to vifit and to comfort him . His beloved fifter, the duchefs of Alencon, who was in all refpects one of the most amiable women of that age, came to confole, and at the fame time to counfel him. She, in a fhort time, had fo many lovers and fo many creatures in the emperor's court, that he knew not how to act : by her advice the king feemed to give up all, inftructing her, at her return, to caufe the dauphin to be proclaimed king, and to abandon him, rather than his people, to diftrefs and mifery. But, under all this appearance, were couched A D. 1525. a variety of intrigues, for the king's efcape, reviving the war in Italy, and depriving Charles of his own kingdom, and giving it to his own general, the marquis de Pefcara; contrivances which fo amazed the emperor, that he took a refolution of caufing her to be arrefted the very day her fafe-conduct expired, which defign, when the had defeated by travelling night and day, and he heard of the king of Navarre's escape out of the castle of Pavia, he determined to make an end of the treaty, by obliging Francis to purchafe his liberty upon as high terms as poffible h. On this occasion he acted contrary to the advice of the wifest of his council, who forefaw that all the advantages would be defeated, and the refentment remain.

8 Memoires de Bellay,

At the beginning of the year this great affair was ad- Signs the infted, the treaty bearing date at Madrid, on the 14th of treaty of January; it was in all respects as advantageous to the em- Madrid. peror, as difastrous to the king, and as prejudicial to the French nation as it well could be (E). Those who fay that the king's patience was tired out, and that he was determined to gain his liberty at any rate, which he might have done upon much easier terms, if he could have brought himfelf to bear his captivity with patience, do much more credit to him and to those who advised him. than fuch as pretend not barely to excufe, but to vindicate his conduct, which certainly was very irregular as well as extraordinary. He protefted before certain notaries and witneffes, whom he could truft, before he figned it, that what he did was against his will, and under constraint; therefore null and void. A month after figning the treaty. during all which time he remained as close a prifoner as before, the viceroy of Naples came into his chamber just as an ague fit left him, and told him he was come to efpouse him, as proxy for the queen-dowager Eleanor, though that princefs was then within a few miles of Ma-

(E) The principal articles of this treaty, fo much exclaimed against, were these : that the king of France fhould marry queen Leonora, the emperor's fifter, and have with her two hundred thousand crowns of gold. That Francis should be released on the 10th of March, and the fame day fhould deliver to the emperor his two fons in hoftage. That he fhould refign to the empéror the duchy of Burgundy, in full fovereignty. That he should defist from the homage the emperor owed him for Flanders and Artois. That he fhould renounce all claim to Naples, Milan, Afti, Tournay, Lifle, Hefdin, &c. That he fhould perfuade Henry d'Albret to refign the kingdom of Navarre to the emperor, or at least foould give him no affistance That within forty days he should reftore the duke of Bourbon and all his party to their estates. That he fhould restore Philibert de Chalons, prince of Orange, and Michael. Antonio de Saluzzo, to their principalities. That he fhould give no fort of affiftance to the duke of Gueldres, and, after that prince's death, fhould use his best endeavours to cause his towns to fall into the emperor's hands. That he fhould pay the king of England five hundred thousand crowns which the emperor owed him. That when the emperor went to Italy to receive the imperial crown, he fhould lend him twelve gallies, four large fhips, and a land army ; or two hundred thou fand crowns instead of the army. Laftly, he promifed, upon the word and honour of a prince, to execute all these articles; or, in case of non-performance, to return prifoner into Spain.

drid; the emperor afterwards conducted him to fee his future spouse; and, after the visit, fent him back to his prifon<sup>1</sup>. On the 21ft of February, after exacting from his own mouth the ftrongest affurances that he would adhere literally to the treaty, under pretence of conducting him a little way on the road, the emperor took leave of him, and fent him under a ftrong guard to the frontiers; there he was exchanged against his two eldest fons, who were put into the hands of the Spaniards without their being fuffered to take leave of their father k. The vifcount de Lautrec received him; and as foon as he fet foot into his own dominions, he mounted a fleet Turkish horfe, and rode full gallop to St. John de Luz; there taking a little refreshment, he proceeded with all possible dispatch to Bayonne, where he found the regent and the whole court everjoyed at his return 1.

He immediately figned the bonds flipulated by the treaty, fures taken which the regent had made with Henry the Eighth, and at the fame time wrote in the ftrongest terms to thank that monarch for the fhare he had in his deliverance m. He was ftrongly folicited by the Spaniards to ratify the treaty of Madrid; but he kept aloof, alleging, that many things were contained therein which regarded his fubjects, and it was requifite for him to know their fentiments, and how far it would be in his power to comply with them before he entered into any fresh engagements. Within the fpace of two months he entered into the holy league, which was calculated to reduce the emperors's power, to fettle the quiet of Italy, and to annul the harsheft part of the treaty of Madrid ". In the month of June he publicly received remonftrances from the ftates of Burgundy, in which they told him, without ceremony, that he had done what he had no right to do, in breach of the laws, and of his coronation oath; adding, that if he perfifted in his refolution of throwing them under a foreign yoke, they muft appeal to the general flates of the kingdom. He received thefe remonstrances in a public audience, the viceroy of Naples and other Spanish ministers being prefent, who, perceiving the end aimed at, expostulated with him in pretty warm terms. At length the viceroy told him, that he had now nothing left but to keep his royal word in returning to the cafile of Madrid , as his predeceffor king

John had done in a like cafe. Francis replied, that king John did well and right; that he returned to a king, who had ufed him like a king, and treated with him as a king; but that at Madrid he had received fuch ufage as would have been unbecoming to a gentleman; that he had often declared to the emperor's minifters, that the terms they extorted from him were unjuft and impracticable; but that he was ftill willing to do all that was fit and reafonable, and to ranfom his fons at the rate of two millions of gold, in lieu of the duchy of Burgundy<sup>p</sup>.

Hitherto the treaty for the tranquility of Italy had been The league kept fecret, in hopes the emperor would have confented to for prefome mitigation of that of Madrid; but now, the reafon of ferving the the thing lying the other way, it was judged most expedient of Italy to proclaim it, though the viceroy of Naples and the Spa- publicly nifh lords were still at the French court. It was styled the proclaimed. Holy League, becaufe the pope was at the head of it; the king, the Venetians, and the duke of Milan, were the contracting parties 9. Henry of England was admitted in the fuperior title of Protector; it was wholly defensive, and the emperor was at liberty to enter into it, provided he accepted the king's offer of two millions for the releafe of his children, and left the duke of Milan, and the reft of the princes of Italy, in quiet poffellion of their dominions . The king's great point was to obtain his children A.D.1526. upon the terms he had propoled; and he was defirous of knowing what hopes there were of fucceeding in that point, before he acted against the monarch who had them in his power. By this procrastination the duke of Milan and pope Clement were facrificed. The former was obliged to furrender to the duke of Bourbon; and the latter was furprifed by the Colonnas, both of which difasters would have been prevented if French fuccours had entered Italy in time ".

of Bourbon facked Rome, and though he was killed in mounting the breach, his army, under the command of the prince of Orange, became mafters of the place, and of the perfon of the pope. It is by no means clear, that Bourbon had the emperor's orders for this expedition : on the contrary, it feens to have been dictated to him by neceffity, his army being become what the Companies were in the days of king John; and fome have fuggefted, that, if he had furvived this enterprize, he would have marched into the kingdom of Naples, and have either feized it for himfelf, or have made his peace, by reftoring it to the king his mafter w. Be that as it will, the news made way for another treaty between the kings of France and England, by which they engaged to fend thirty thousand foot, and a thousand gens d'arms, into Italy *. But before the pope received any advantage from these flipulations, he was forced to deliver up aimoft every place of any confequence that was in his poffestion, agree to pay a ranfom of four hundred thousand crowns, and to remain a prisoner till this treaty was executed. At length, in the beginning of the month of August, marshal Lautrec arrived in the Milanefe, with a numerous army; the king, about the fame A.D.1527. time, concluded a third treaty with Henry y. Genoa furrendered and declared once more for France; the best part of the Milanefe was conquered by marshal Lautrec, and fairly given up to the duke 2. In September there was a fourth treaty concluded with Henry. The arms of the confederates prevailed in Italy, where, on the 2d of October, marshal Lautrec took Pavia by affault; and, in the first transports of their fury, the French revenged themfelves cruelly on that place, for the defeat which they had fuffered before it a. He afterwards paffed the Po, upon which the duke of Ferrara and the marquis of Mantua quitted the party of the emperor, and embraced that of the allies. In confequence of this change of affairs, the pope recovered his liberty, not by treaty, but by flealing out of the caftle of St. Angelo b. This year the princefs Renee was contracted to Hercules de Efte ; and the parliament, after feveral letters of juffion, registered the letters patent, by which the county of Guile was erected into a dukedom and peerage, in favour of Claude de Lorrain, brother to the duke of that title .

According to the agreement between the two kings, Francis Francis and Henry, their ambaffadors went into Spain, at- and Charles tended each of them by a herald, in order to fummon the defame emperor to accept the terms which had been offered him ; each other. and, in cafe of refufal, to declare war. It leems the emperor's answer was forescen at the court of France; and therefore king Francis had previoufly called together an affembly of the Notables, that is, perfons of the feveral ranks of his people, upon whom he could depend, and in whom he could confide; he proposed to them the great queftion, whether he was bound to perform the treaty of Madrid, or whether, if he did not perform it, he was obliged in honour to return to Spain d. That affembly pronounced in favour of the negative on both points; they faid that Burgundy was united to the crown of France, and that he could not feparate it by his own authority; that his perfon alfo was the property of the public, of which, therefore, he could not difpofe; but for the two millions, which they looked upon as a just equivalent, they undertook it fhould be raifed for his fervice . When the ambaffadors had communicated their proposition, and the heralds had declared their meffage to the emperor publicly, Charles treated the English herald with refpect, and the herald from France with contempt, intimating, that Francis had broke his word, and that, as he had been before given to understand, there was but one way of ending fuch difputes between men of honour f.

When this declaration was reported to the king, he was New turn extremely angry, fent a challenge to the emperor, con- of affairs in ceived in very coarfe terms; and when an answer was re- Italy. turned by Charles's herald, he refused to hear it, alleging, that his fafe-conduct was limited to the propofal of a proper field, where they might terminate this quarrel, and, therefore he would hear him fpeak to that, and nothing elle : if both these princes had not, upon other occasions. given indifputable proofs of their perfonal courage, the conduct of both, upon this occasion, would have done no great honour to their characters 8. In Italy, Odet de Foix, marshal de Lautrec, reduced all the kingdom of Naples, except Gaeta and the capital, while Phillippin Doria defeated and killed the imperial viceroy Moncada at fea; fo that all things feemed to go profperoufly; but the face of events quickly changed. An epidemic fickness prevailed in the French army that blocked up Naples; and, from twenty-five thousand foot, and eight hundred men at arms, reduced them to one hundred men at arms, and four thousand foot ". Marshal Lautree himself died, rather of chagrin than any other difeafe; he was never fortunate, nor had a high opinion of his own merit, and had taken this command against his will; for the king of England and the flate of Venice had refufed their concurrence to this expedition, unlefs he fhould be invefted with the command. His grief proceeded from his being ill fupplied, and very indifferently fupported by the Venetians; the marquis of Saluces, who took the command upon his death, raifed the blockade of Naples, and retired to Averfo, where, to fave the handful of troops he had left, he rendered himfelf prifoner to the prince of Orange i. A.D.1528. Another misfortune happened about the fame time. Andrew Doria, one of the greatest captains, and one of the worthiest men this age had produced, offered king Francis two hundred thousand crowns in gold to have the difpofal of the government of Genoa, and for the town and port of Savona. It was not through intereft or ambition that he made this propofal, but out of a generous defign of reftoring liberty to his native country, and putting into her hands a place that was like to become her rival *: there was no reafon the king fhould not have done this in return for the great fervices rendered him by Doria. but he had given the cuftoms of the port of Savona to his favourite Anne de Montmorency ; and the chancellor du Prat, to make his court to the favourite, reprefent ed this propofal as impertinent and feditious, advifing that the command of the gallies fhould be taken from Doria, and his person fecured : monsieur de Barbesieux was sent to Genoa for this purpole, to whom Doria delivered the king's gallies, but carried his own into the fervice of the emperor, and quickly recovered both Genoa and Savona 1. The count de St. Pol coming, however, with a fresh body of troops into the Milanefe, recovered feveral places from the Imperialists, and revived a little the drooping hopes of the allies, who faw that a peace, made under fuch circumftances, would be their ruin m.

All the French writers concur in giving Francis the character of an open, generous, and candid prince; but at the fame time, they record facts which are not very confident The cruel with these praises. The king instructed his ministers to as well as prefs the allies to make their utmost efforts, which they double could not do without his making at the fame time promifes dealing of Francis of great fuccours, and giving them alfo affurances that he with his would act with vigour ". He fent, in all probability, the allies to the like inftructions to his generals; fo that thus far all was peace of of a piece; but at the fame time, all that was meant by Cambray. it was, obtaining better terms by the conclusion of a peace then on the carpet. The use, therefore, this great king made of his allies, was, to miflead them into measures that might turn to his profit at their expence. In confequence of these orders, the few forces he had left in Calabria acted very chearfully, in conjunction with the Venetians, as the count de St. Pol did with the troops of the fame flate, under the command of the duke of Urbino, and with the duke of Milan in the Milanefe, till his army was entirely routed, and himfelf, chiefly by his own fault, taken by Don Antonio Leva, at the battle of Landriano, on the 22d of June °. This event contributed to the conclusion of the treaty at Cambrav. 'This has been ftyled, with propriety enough, the Ladies Peace, fince it was entirely negociated by the princefs Margaret of Savoy, governels of the Low Countries, on the behalf of the emperor, and Madame, the French king's mother P. In this treaty, the emperor, inftead of the poffellion, contented himfelf with referving his rights on the duchy of Burgundy, and the two millions of crowns that had been fo often mentioned; of these he was to receive one million two hundred thousand in ready money, upon delivering the princes' lands in Flanders, belonging to the houfe of Bourbon, computed at four hundred thousand; and the other four hundred thousand was to be paid by Francis. in discharge of the emperor's debt to the king of England. Francis was likewife to difcharge the penalty of five hundred thousand crowns, which the emperor had incurred by not marrying his niece, the princefs Mary of England, and to release the rich fleur de lys, m'any years before pawned by the houfe of Burgundy for fifty thousand crowns 9. The town and caftle of Hefdin was also yielded ; together with the fovereignty of Flanders and Artois, and all the king's pretenfions in Italy.

The generous conduct of Henry VIII. towards Francis, in respect to this treaty.

A.D.1529.

As for the allies of France, they were abandoned to the emperor's mercy, without the least flipulation in their favour, and, which was more extraordinary, the bishop of Tarbes was actually foliciting the republic of Venice to profecute the war, when the fenate received advice of this peace. But to be confiftent or rather inconfiftent in every thing, Francis protefted against the validity of this treaty before he ratified it, as his attorney-general did, before it was registered in parliament; but both with the greatest privacy imaginable . Henry of England received the news coldly, and might probably have expressed his diflike in ftronger terms; but at the fame time the news were communicated, the French ambaffador added, that his mafter had a great influence over his univerfities, and would very gladly employ it to gratify his brother Henry. His majefty of England took this hint fo kindly, that he remitted the emperor's penalty of half a million of crowns; and, as a farther inftance of his generofity, fent the famous fleur de lys as a present to Henry duke of Orleans, his godfon s. It happened very luckily for the Italians, that great troubles broke out about this time in Germany, and the Turks invaded Hungary, a circumftance which induced the emperor to deal juftly with them, and to leave Sforza in poffeffion of the duchy of Milan, which, otherwife, there is the ftrongest probability he would not have. done.

The children of Francis delivered, and his gucen brought into France.

At this time the marshal de Montmorency, being in the zenith of his favour, was chosen by the king to carry the money, which was to be paid to the emperor, and to receive his children and his confort. The king repaired to Bourdeaux, while the marshal went to Fontarabia, where he fettled all things with the conftable of Caftile; and towards the end of the month of June, the exchange was made at the fame place, and with the fame ceremony ufed at the deliverance of the king about four years before t. Francis went to meet his children and his queen, and, after the marriage ceremonies were performed, made a public entry with her into Bourdeaux. return of peace gave the king an opportunity of diffinguilking himfelf in a way that did him great honour. Though bufinets and amufements had left him little or no time to make himfelf a fcholar, yet he had a general knowlege in, and a true tafte for the fciences. William Budé, one of the greatest lawyers of that age, and a very able statesman, John de Bellay bishop of Paris, and afterwards cardinal, and Peter du Chastel who became bishop of Macon, had acquired and maintained themfelves in the king's good graces by affifting him in his fludies. The king gave them, from time to time, heads of what he defired to underftand; and it was their buliness to instruct him by fuccinct, methodical, and clear difcourfes, which were commonly read to him at or after his meals. John Lascaris, a Greek, of a most noble family, by procuring him many valuable manufcripts, laid the foundation of a royal library, to which a printing-houfe was added. By the advice of thefe great men, he erected chairs for Hebrew and Greek profeffors, in the university of Paris, which were first filled by Francis Vatable and Peter Danés. By thefe and other acts of the fame nature, he obtained the glorious title of Father and Reftorer of Letters ".

The coronation of the queen, and her public entry into Diath of Paris, having gratified the people with thews and feafts, the duchefs the king thought it expedient for his honour and their of Angoufafety, to appoint judges by a fpecial commission, who lime. were to travel through the kingdom, and hold what the French call les grands jours, which is pretty near the fame with our affifes, wherein they judged all caufes without appeal, and redreffed innumerable grievances which had crept in during the king's imprifonment, and other diforders in the government *. In the month of September A.D.15312 died Madame, the king's mother, to whom the hiftorian of Savoy y gives as high a character as words can well exprefs; but the French writers, who confider that, by her piques against the constable of Bourbon and the vifcount de Lautrec, the loft the duchy of Milan twice; that, by her intrigues, Semblanfai, one of the wifeft and moft virtuous ministers France ever had, was brought to an unjust and ignominious death; and that fhe was the great fupport of chancellor du Prat, whole character was of another caft, they are not quite fo lavish in her praises z; however. they acknowlege that, during the king's imprifonment, fhe governed well, and that they were indebted to her for the peace of Cambray, of which the nation flood in great need.

The king had been long defirous of uniting the duchy of Bretagne to his crown, in some more effectual manner than by all the ceffions that had hitherto been made. He confulted upon this, as upon every affair of ftate, his oracle of Bretagne du Prat, who fludied the point diligently; and though exfor ever to pedients were his talent, yet he found this bufinels fo perthe crown. plexed, that he knew not well what method to advife. The king directed him to confer with Lewis des Deferts.

prefident of the parliament of Bretagne, a man of great parts and probity. The chancellor entered freely into a long detail of the enquiries he had made, and of the projects he had formed. The prefident heard him patiently, and difapproved them in the grofs. He told him there was but one way of doing this bufinefs, which was, to engage the flates of the duchy to demand this union of themfelves. The chancellor fhewed his great abilities in putting up all his papers, and declaring that he would leave the management of this arduous affair to a man who had convinced him, by a few words, that he underflood it fo much better than he 2.

He succeeds in this by the prudent managethe parliament of Bretagne.

By the advice of the prefident, the king made a tour into Bretagne, where he corrected whatever was amifs. did many popular acts, carefied the leading members of ment of the the flates, and, by honours, gifts, and places, gained them prefident of to his party. But, notwithstanding all these precautions, when the propofal was opened, debates ran very high in the allembly of the flates, more especially amongst the The deputy from Nantz particularly inveighed commons. bitterly against the proposal, as tending to invade and deftroy their liberties, to make them, of a free ftate, a mere province, and to deprive them of all they had left, which was the hope of being, fome time or other, what they once were, a free and feparate principality; but he declaimed ftill more violently against the method in which this was to be done, which he reprefented as forging their own chains, renouncing their birthrights, and, instead of being forced, defiring this as a favour, which they ought to confider as the highest injury. The prefident, who expected this florm, obliged the friends of the court to be pailive, and let the deputies vent their refentments freely. But when their first fury was over, he fent for the deputy of Nantz, and for fuch as had manifelted parts as well as zeal in the debate; and reprefented to them calmly, that they entirely miftook the matter and their own intereft. He admitted, that the privileges, the independency, and the prerogatives of the duchy of Bretagne, were extremely valuable to its inhabitants, and what it ought to be their perpetual fludy to preferve; he fliewed them that they had been often in danger under their dukes ; that their country fuffered frequently by being the feat of war; and that, if it ever came to be feparated again from the crown of France, it would be fooner or later conquered, lofe its privileges, and become indeed a province. He added, that by being annexed in this manner, they gained all they could wifh, and more than they could expect in another way; that by having the monarch of France not for their king, but their duke, they fecured the protection of that crown, without lofing their independency. In rcfpect to the manner of doing it by their own demand, he proved that this was fo far from being injurious, that it was both honourable and advantageous; it was a proof of their freedom, an obligation conferred on their fovereign, and a treaty of union between one flate and another. The deputies fubmitted, their heats fubfided gradually; and thus, by a prudent application of lucrative motives, to those whom nothing elfe could move, and by opening the true flate of things to those whose ears were not deaf to argument, he carried his point, and that in fuch a manner, that the parliament of Paris protefted against the condefcention which the king thewed in this matter, being ashamed to fee that, through the wifdom and weight of one man, the liberties of Bretagne were fixed upon fo much better a basis than their own b.

In the month of October the king had a conference A  $D_{.1534}$ with Henry the Eighth at Calais, in which that friendthip which had fublited for fome time between them was much Francis ftrengthened; they complained mutually of the double and Henry dealing of the pope, and of the too great power and ambition of the emperor; but, as thirgs then flood, they firmly agreed on nothing but a declaration of their readincfs to arm a body of eighty thousand men to act againft the Turks, by which they fought to amufe Charles, and to gain a reputation with the reft of the European powers; for it does not appear that either of thefe monarchs was much in earneft in this affair; but rather gave it out for the purposes before mentioned, and that they might, if they thought it convenient, arm by fea or land in their own dominions, under this pretence, and without giving umbrage to other princes . The emperor, on his fide, amufed them likewife, his affairs being fo perplexed in Germany that he knew not well how to act, and the Turkish fultan being on the point of making an irruption into his brother Ferdinand's dominions with the whole force of his empire. In the management of these affairs. he made use chiefly of the mediation of the queen his fifter, whofe overtures Francis received with great teftimonies of kindnefs and civility, but without fuffering them to make any impreflion. Thefe frivolous intercourfes of mere policy anfwered the end of both parties, by keeping things quiet, and affording them leifure to take their own measures, till a favourable opportunity fhould offer for explaining their true fentiments.

e caufes s fecond n Henry, ske of Orans, to boufe Gaerine de fedicis.

The king had many good reafons to fuppofe the peace would not last long. He was himfelf not much better fatisfied with the treaty of Cambray, than he had been. with that of Madrid; he was still as much perfuaded as ever of his rights to the kingdom of Naples and duchy of Milan, and extremely chagrined at the lofs of his fuperiority over Flanders, which he had been obliged to renounce; befides thefe, the emperor had taken precautions for his own fecurity, which gave Francis fresh difquiet. He had compelled the princes of Italy to enter into a defenfive alliance, which was, in effect, an alliance against France. He had taken infinite pains to detach the duke of Savoy from the party of Francis, and had fold him the county of Afte, or Afti, very convenient indeed for that duke, but which had been the ancient patrimony of the house of Orleans. But what gave him most pain of all was, that by the help of the duke of Savoy, who had a great influence over the Swifs, Charles was labouring to detach both them and the Grifons from their alliance with France. The king determined to use his utmost endeavours to prevent this blow, but at the fame time very wifely confidering, that a kingdom must be very infecure, while the principal ftrength of its armies confifted in mercenaries, he took a refolution to put an end to that evil, by eftablishing a national infantry; and as, in all probability, this thought occurred to him from his conversations with his learned friends, he directed those corps to be formed in the manner, and beftowed on them the name. of Legions<sup>d</sup>. In order to gain once more an opening into Italy, he negociated a marriage between his fon Henry, duke of Orleans, and Catherine de Medicis, ftyled duchefs of Urbino, niece to the pope. The emperor Charles had proposed a marriage between this young princess and the duke of Milan; but when pope Clement mentioned the overture that had been made him from France, the emperor himfelf advised him to prefer it, thinking it impoffible the king fhould be in earneft, or ever intend to fink fo low as fuch an alliance . In this opinion, however, he found himfelf miltaken; and though the duke of Savoy, to oblige him, rendered an interview at Nice impracticable, yet the pope, embarking at Genoa, landed at Marfeilles on the fourth of October f. The marriage was celebrated there with all the magnificence for which this prince was famous 8. He laboured likewife to engage the pope to give his ally, the king of England, fatisfaction He could not indeed prevail on him to fufpend his excommunication of Henry on his marriage with Anna Bullen; but he perfuaded him to keep it fecret, and fent John du Bellay, bithop of Paris, to negociate with Henry, which he did fo effectually, as to prevent his feparating immediately from communion with the church of Rome; though in the depth of winter, he went in perfon to carry thefe news to the pope, with whom he concerted the means of adjufting this perplexed affair of the divorce. and procured the publication of the fentence to be put off to a day certain, that it might be known whether or not Henry would accept the terms. No anfwer coming, Bellay preffed for a farther fuspension for fix days only, which was refused, and the fentence published b. Two days after arrived the king's fubmiffion, but it was then too late<sup>1</sup>. This circumstance, however, shews the fincerity of Francis and his agent.

All this time the king had in view a breach with the Measures emperor, when a proper opportunity flould offer, and to taken by the this point all his endeavours were directed. Charles, who emperor. was by no means ignorant of his fentiments, took all pollible methods to let the world into the fecret, that, whenever a war happened, the blame of it might fall up, on Francis. He had demanded affiftance both in men and money for his war against the Turks, in a manner which he knew must produce a refusal: this he magnified to the dyct, and upon all occasions reprefented the king to the princes of Germany as his irreconcileable enemy. In this conduct, his politics were too refined, for the princes of Germany took from thence occasion to negociate with the king for his affiftance, in the fupport of their liberties, than which nothing could be more difagreeable to Charles k. But while they were thus employed in fecret leagues and negociations, an event happened, which at once produced a war: the king had fent Merveille, a Milanefe gentlemen, who had acquired a great fortune in France, who was uncle to the chancellor of Milan, as his ambaffador to the duke, who being afraid to receive him openly, defired that his credentials fhould be only communicated to himfelf<sup>1</sup>.

The king's . But the emperor fulpecting the truth, gave the duke to understand, that unlefs he had fatisfaction on the head of this French minister, he was not to expect his niece, the princefs of Denmark, for a wife; the poor duke fent him king Francis's letters, in which he recommended him only as a gentleman who had a mind to make a tour into his own country, to fettle his family concerns. Merveille having at this juncture a quarrel with one of the family of -Caffiglione, and this man coming with feveral perfons armed to infult him in his houfe, was killed by his domestics. Francis Sforza, upon this outrage, committed him to prifon, and being apprehensive he might declare his public character, caufed him to be beheaded without form or process.". This execution was resented by the king in the warmeft manner; he even complained of it at the court of the emperor, who answered coolly, that the duke of Milan had a right to punifh his own fubject for the murder; on which the French ambaffador produced the clearest proofs that Merveille had been fent to, and owned by the duke of Milan, as the king's ambaffador; a circumftance that afforded great fatisfaction to Charles, who discovered at once the deceit of Sforza, and that he was now embarraffed beyond reconciliation with the court of France". It is true he fent his chan-- cellor to offer excuses, though he was the nephew of the gentleman who had been fo hardly treated, a ftep which rather inflamed than abated the quarrel. Before the end of the year, an event happened, which was far from being acceptable to the French court ; this was the death of pope Clement, who had promifed to give his nicce Modena, Pifa, Leghorn, Parma, and Placentia, and to unite his forces with those of the king, for the conquest of Urbino". But Francis, who knew his ambition and his attachment to his family, to which he had more than once facrificed his dignity, his fafety, and his confcience, relied very much upon his aid in the expedition he was about to undertake; and there is no doubt that, after procuring his nephew to be raifed by the emperor to the fovereignty of Florence, he would have been equally pleafed to fee his niece placed on the ducal throne of Milan, by the arms of France. The difappointment was ' great, and it would have been happy for his fubjects, if the king had thought it fo great as to defift from the intended war, of which, in loting him, he certainly loft his chief fupport.

The war with Milan was, notwithstanding, refolved The king upon, and the king made valt preparations for it; but, enters into in order to reach the dominions of that prince, he was a war under a neceflity of demanding a paffage through those of with the the duke of Savoy; and this necessity produced a previous Savor. war with that duke, which did not at all difpleafe Francis, who had many reasons to be offended with him, and who refolved to take this opportunity of chaftifing him feverely. But before he began the war, he took a very extraordinary flep with regard to religion. His beloved fifter Margaret, queen of Navarre, was inclined to favour the new opinions; that is, was disposed to become a Protestant; and she had such an influence on her brother, that he had once taken a refolution of inviting Melancthon to his court; but he was diverted from that ftep by the cardinal de Tournon. Taking occasion from some papers that had been fixed against the Louvre, containing arguments against the doctrines of transubstantiation, he caused fix perfons to be burnt with extraordinary cruelty. Nay, he made a wild declaration, that if he thought the blood in his arm was tainted with the Lutheran herefy, he would caufe it to be cut off; and that he would not fpare even his own children, if they entertained fentiments contrary to those of the Catholic church P. But while he was thus employed, an event happened, that once more changed the face of affairs; this was the death of Francis Sforza, duke of Milan, upon which the emperor fent the famous Granvelle to offer the king the investiture of the duchy of Milan, for his third fon the duke de Angoulefine, which offer produced a long negociation, with ftrong professions of fincerity on both fides, and with very little of reality in it on either '. The duke of Savoy, to whom the king had made fome propositions of peace, rejected them, notwithstanding the diftrefs he was in, and made an offer to the emperor of exchanging the county of Nice, and all his territories on this fide the Alps, for lands in Italy, which, if Charles had accepted, would have opened him a paffage into the heart of France, and this propofal irritated the king ftill more than all the injuries he had fuftained from the duke already '.

The emperor Charles the Fifth was now in the zenith of his glory, just returned in triumph from his African expedition, and having a numerous army and many great captains about him in the kingdom of Naples, he framed vaft defigns, in order to the execution of which he found it neceffary to amufe Francis, a tafk that he performed with great fuccefs '. Then he proceeded to Rome, where, in the prefence of pope Paul the Third, of the houfe of Farnefe, and his cardinals, he inveighed bitterly, in a Spanish oration, against Francis, talking of fighting him hand to hand, in an ifland, on a bridge, or in the midft of a river on board a bark; but when the French ambassadors demanded a copy of this fpeech, and defired to know whether he intended it as a defiance to their master, or pretended to impeach his honour, he refufed it, and qualified all he had faid, by alleging, that in the heat of his difcourse he had mentioned a fingle combat as a means of preventing the effusion of Christian blood, which, knowing the generofity and bravery of Francis, he conceived he would not refuse". At the fame time his partizans gave out that Francis had folicited the Turks to invade Hungary, and afcribed to French emiffaries the fires that had happened in different parts of the opire, by which fuch a fpirit was raifed, that Willian, du Bellay, lord of Langei, whom the king fent into Germany to negociate, durft not appear in public *. But in a little time, through the address of that minister, those fehemes were diffipated, and, like all others of that kind, turned upon their authors, and proved highly prejudicial to the emperor's affairs, who really intended no more than to hinder his antagonist from levying troops in the empire, to ruin his credit with the German princes, and to facilitate his own enterprize y.

The admiral quickly became mafter of Turin, Foffan, and Coni; forced the duke of Savoy to fhut himfelf up in Verceil, and would have made himfelf mafter allo of that fortrefs, if he had not been awed by the emperor's army in that neighbourhood, commanded by Antonio de Leva z. However, when the king received politive intelligence that the empcror's true defign was to invade France with that numerous army of veteran troops, which he thought invincible, he ordered . all his forces, a fmall number excepted, to leave Piedmont, and repais the mountains, declaring the marquis de Saluces, who had been bred up with him, and for whom he had a great affection, his lieutenant in Italy, directing him to put Turin, Foffan, and Coni, into the best posture of defence possible 2, and to distribute his troops amongst them. The marquis believing, from the posture of affairs, that the French would never more be able to enter Italy, went over to the emperor, betrayed Coni, and

Claude d'Annebaut had a good garrifon in Turin, and appeared fo little inclined to part with it, that the emperor, being afraid of lofing the feafon. contented himfelf with caufing it to be blocked up by a good corps of troops; and directing his march through the county of Nice, entered France in July, with an army of fifty thousand men, the marguis del Vasto acting as general of foot, Ferdinand Gonzaga as general of the light horfe, and the duke of Alba at the head of the gens d'arms, Antonio de Leva having the chief command under the emperor b. The king gave the command of his army to his favourite the marshal of Montmorency, with instructions to lay the whole country waste from the Alps to Marfeilles, and from the fea to the frontiers of Dauphine; to encamp with his army under Avignon, covered by the Rhofne and the Durance; and not to hazard a battle upon any terms c, Charles invades France, befreges Mar feilles, and is forced to make retreat.

The emperor quickly found the effects of this disposition : being extremely ftraitened for provisions, his army diminished daily; and, after attempting to draw the marfhal out of his lines, and having brought his army before Arles, at length he befieged Marfeilles. While he was thus employed, the dauphin Francis died at Tournon, on a miferable the 12th of August, of poifon, which was charged, by the perfon who administered it, when he came to be exeeuted, upon Ferdinand Gonzaga and Antonio de Leva; whence a great, though probably undeferved, blemith was thrown upon the emperor's reputation d. Ou the 25th of September, Charles raifed the fiege, after having loft more than half his army by fickness and skirmishes. He was fo haraffed in his paffage, that he had not ten thoufand men in a condition to ferve when he entered Piedmont, where he found his affairs in a very bad fituation, Annebaut having forced his troops to raife the fiege of Turin, and having a good army in the field. The count de Naffau, who had entered Picardy from the Low Countries, had met with no better fortune; for the marquis de Fleuranges, afterwards marshal de la Marck, defended Peronne fo obstinately, that after two affaults he was conftrained to raife the fiege . On the first report of the great preparations made by the emperor to invade France, James V. king of Scotland, affembled a confiderable body of troops, and having embarked them on board his fleet, endeavoured to transport them to the oppofite coaft; and though this fcheme was Francis, prevented by contrary winds, yet that monarch landed in and marperfon at Dieppe, and repaired to the French camp. where the king then was with the dauphin Henry. This was effeemed fo generous an action, that, upon the Scotch king's demanding the princefs Magdalen in marriage, Francis thought himfelf obliged in honour to grant it, though he was very apprehensive of its altering the good understanding between himfelf and Henry of England, which had been fo beneficial to both crowns; and therefore he fent a minister to England, to obtain Henry's confent to the marriage of his nephew, or at least to excufe it ; but the king was fo angry, that he would not hear it mentioned f. It took place, however, on the first day of the new year, and the king returned foon after with his new queen to Scotland, where the did not furvive many months t.

The fuccefs of the laft campaign elevated Francis fo The kine much, that he acted the very fame part Charles had done caufes the year before in Italy. He ordered the emperor to be Charles to proceeded against before the parliament of Paris; and that affembly declared, that, by violating the treaty of Cam- fore the bray, he had forfeited all title to the advantages derived parliament therefrom, and that confequently the king entered into of Paris. his ancient rights of fovereignty over the counties of Flanders, Artois, and Charolois. Upon this declaration, he was fummoned, by found of trumpet, by the name of Charles of Auftria, vallal to the crown of France, to anfwer before that tribunal, where, being condemned of felony and contumacy, in taking up arms and not appearing, those counties were declared confiscated, and united to the crown<sup>b</sup>. The dauphin then marched with an army to relieve the place, but, by the interpolition of the queen of France, and her fifter Mary, governefs of the Netherlands, a truce was concluded for that frontier, for A.D. 1537. a few months k. This afforded the king leifure to fulfil. in fome measure, the treaty he had made with Solyman, emperor of the Turks. He fent the dauphin and marshal Montmorency before him into Piedmont, who forced the pafs of Suza, and relieved Turin. The king followed them; but, at the persuafion of the pope, confented, in the month of November, to a truce, during which both parties were to keep what was in their hands, which mortified the duke of Savoy extremely, who faw his fubjects and his dominions fuffer alike from his allies and from his enemies 1: but Solyman, who had made an irruption into Hungary, and fent a great fleet into the Mediterrancan to join the French, was no lefs difappointed and provoked.

The king, to reward the fervices he had received from the marshal de Montmorency, who, fince the death of the chancellor du Prat, was become his first minister, bestowed on him the constable's fword, that he might command his armies with greater dignity, and made Montejan and and Annebaut marshals of Francem. One would have concluded from hence, that he intended to carry on the war with greater vigour than ever; but, by the perfuation of pope Paul III. he agreed to an interview with the emperor and that pontiff, at Nice, the only place the duke of Savoy had left, who was with great difficulty brought to this agreement. The emperor remained at Villa Franca, the pope at a monaftery near Nice, and the king a quarter of a league from thence; fo that the two princes did not fee each other, but communicated their fentiments to the pope, who conferred with them alternately ". The queen of France went to make her brother a visit by fea, which had like to have been fatal to them both; for a bridge made in hafte being thrown from the fhore to her galley, which was about fifty paces, and the emperor going to receive her as the came out of the veffel, the bridge gave way, and they fell both together into the fea, but were happily taken up without hurt. finding it impoffible to adjust things to between the two monarchs as to establish a peace, contented himfelf with doing his own bufinefs effectually, by marrying Octavio Farnefe to Margaret of Auftria, and prolonging the truce between Charles and Francis for ten years, during which fpace the king was to keep that part of Piedmont which he had conquered, and the emperor, for his own fecurity, retained the reft ". Thefe points being fettled, the king returned, towards the end of June, into his own dominions, and the emperor embarked for Spain; but being driven on the coaft of France, he fent one of the officers of his houfhold to Avignon, where the king was, to let him know that he was very defirous of conferring with him. Francis, ftruck with this mark of civility and con- A.D. 1535. fidence, fet out for Aiguez Mortes, where he received and entertained the emperor on fhore with great magnificence, and was in return feafted by him on board his galley, where they had a very long conference on the ftate of their affairs, and parted with great marks of effeem and cordiality P on both fides; but it does not appear that they concluded any thing of importance, or that this fingular interview had any other effect than that of alarming Henry VIII. of England, who could not be well pleafed with a reconciliation between thefe two princes, more effectially as it was brought about by the pope, whom he confidered as his capital enemy. The king making his public entry into Leon, the crowd was fo great, that the chancellor, Anthony du Bourg, who rode near him, according to the cuftom of those times, upon a mule, was thrown down and trampled to death. He was fucceeded by William Poget, whole great abilities might have enabled him to difcharge, with honour, that high truft which he acquired by his agreeable converfation; a circumflance that had rendered him very acceptable to the king his mafter 9.

In the beginning of the year, a new treaty was conclud- charles, ed at Toledo, between the emperor and the king, of a on the revery fingular nature, fince it imported no more than that wolt of the neither party flould enter into any engagement, or con- inhabittract any marriage with England, without communicating Ghent. it to the other '. their privileges invaded by Mary queen of Hungary, fifter to the emperor, and governess of the Low Countries, revolted, expelled the emperor's officers, and by a folemn deputation, demanded the redrefs of their grievances from Francis, as their lawful fovereign 5. This was the faireft opportunity that could have offered of refuming what he had loft by the treaty of Cambray : but the king, upon this occasion, laid aside the politician, rejected their propofals, and gave advice to the emperor of all that had happened. Charles found himfelf extremely embarrassed, notwithstanding the king's generous proceeding; for judging his own prefence abfolutely neceffary to extinguish this unexpected flame, he knew not how to pass into the Low Countries with eafe and fafety. By fea he was apprehenfive of the Turkish fleets, which rendered the passage dangerous; and the religious diffurbances in Germany rendered his route that way equally difficult and difagreeable. The fhorteft way was through France; and, with the king's confent, he knew it would be fafeft. In order to procure this, he addreffed himfelf to the bifhop of Tarbes, the French minister at his own court, and to the constable, the king's prime minister and favourite, fuggesting, that he was willing to grant the investiture of the duchy of Milan to the duke of Orleans, and hoped the king would not infift upon his entering into any treaties.

He avails himself of his Superior policy.

This point was difputed in the king's council; the cardinal de Tournon infifted that the emperor fhould make his proposition in writing; but the constable Montmorency was against this demand : he faid, that a promife in writing was not either more binding or more effectual than an unwritten promife, which, in a matter fo concife, might be eafily authenticated; and that the inveftiture being the return of a favour, the beft way to fecure it was to heighten the favour as much as possible in the manner of doing it. This opinion being moft agreeable to the king's own temper, was accepted; and the dauphin and his brother the duke of Orleans were fent to meet the emperor at Bayonne, where they offered to remain hoftages in Spain, till Charles was fafely arrived in the Low Countries; but the emperor very politely refused it, and declared, A.D.1539. that he would rely on his brother Francis's word '. The king himfelf, though but just recovered from a dangerous fit of fickness, went to meet him as far as Chastelleraud.

All poffible honours were paid him in his paffage, and during his thort flay at Paris. At his departure the king accompanied him as far as St. Quintin, the dauphin and the duke of Orleans attended him to Valenciennes". It was now thought good policy, and no breach of decorum, to defire an explicit promife from the emperor of the inveftiture, as the most folid proof of his friendship, and the fureft means of eftablishing a lafting peace : but the emperor began by making a reftriction, afterwards offered the Low Countries, with his daughter, to the duke of Orleans as an equivalent, and at length threw fo many obstacles in the way, that the king found himself deceived. If the French writers are to be believed, it was not barely in this point; they allege, that the emperor gained fuch an afcendancy, by his addrefs, over their monarch, that he drew from him all that had paffed between him and Henry VIII; and, while he yet hold him in hopes of the invefliture, prevailed on him to fend an embaffy to Venice, to diffuade the republic from making a feparate peace with the Turk, which having no effect, leffened his credit with the Italian princes, and ruined him for the prefent with Solyman ", who imputed to ingratitude what was owing to incapacity.

This transaction had terrible confequences in respect to The conthe court and the king's favourites. Francis caufed him to be arrefted, and fent prifoner to Melun *. The chancellor Poget most unworthily undertook to be the instrument of the king's vengeance, picked out commiffioners to enquire into his behaviour, and put himfelf at the head of them; and, partly by promifes, but chiefly through menaces, prevailed upon them, in confequence of very equivocal proofs of his caufing fome dutics to be levied as admiral, to which he had not a very clear right, to pronounce a fentence, by which he was deprived of his

He had affured the king, that the admiral had been guilty of many flagrant, and fome capital offences : when, therefore, he brought him this fentence, he laughed at it; and, having A D.1540. pardoned the admiral, fent for him again to court. The first time he appeared in his prefence, the king faid, "You fee, my lord, it is not quite fo fafe to fet me at defiance." " True, fire (returned the admiral, with his ufual fleadinefs), but they did not find the flightest instance of my want of care or fidelity in your fervice." " No (replied the king) we will look into that." The procefs was referred to the parliament to examine, and they declared him entirely free from blame, on which he was reftored to all his employments, a reparation which did not hinder his dying of chagrin y. The chancellor met with a worfe fate: the family of the admiral attacked his conduct, against which a multitude of informations were produced; and upon thefe, after four years imprisonment, he was condemned in parliament to lofe his office, pay a fine of one hundred thousand livres, and to fuffer five years imprifonment z. He fuffered the two first, but the last was remitted; and, being old and poor, he was forced to get his bread by giving opinions, for his knowlege was refpected, while his perfon was defpifed.

The king's miniflers to Venice, and the grand fignior, are murdered in the Milanefe.

All the king's old favourites being either dead or difgraced, the marshal d'Annebaut, who, without the title, executed the office of conftable, came into the prime direction of affairs, William du Beliay, lord of Langei, fucceeding him in the government of Piedmont<sup>a</sup>. The principal object the king had in view was to prepare for a war; and in thefe preparations innumberable obstacles were to be overcome, the emperor's power being as great as ever, and the king's reputation much funk with foreign powers. In the first place, it was thought expedient to make a treaty with Chriftian III. king of Denmark, and Guflavus king of Sweden, who had the flrongeft interest in oppofing Charles<sup>b</sup>. The king took the duke of Cleves next under. his protection, whole title to Gueldres was queftioned by the emperor, and whofe alliance, by marrying his daughter with Henry VIII. of England, flattered Francis with the hopes of regaining that monarch, though thefe proved vain. However, the alliance of this prince was thought of fuch confequence, that the king gave him in marriage Joan of Albret, heirels of the kingdom of Navarre, in order to widen the breach between him and the emperor, as well as to attach him more immediately to his own interefts; but, the princefs being but eleven years of age, the marriage was never confummated. In order to diffipate the fufpicions which the emperor's emiffaries had infused at Venice and Constantinople, the king fent A Data Cæfar Fregofa and Antonio Rincon, first to the feigniory, and, when they had finished their negotiation with that republic, they were to proceed to the Porte. The marquis del Vafto, governor for the emperor of the duchy of Milan, and the countries depending upon it, having intelligence of their paffage, and fome hint alfo of their bufinefs, caufed their vefiel to be attacked by a party from the garrifon of Pavia, and both the ministers were killed. Some who were with them escaped, and gave an account of the whole affair to M. de Langei, who commanded in Piedmont, and, as foon as the king was acquainted with it, he published it to all Europe, as a most flagrant infult upon the law of nations, as well as a direct breach of the truce. The governor of Milan, however, fleadily difavowed the fact; the emperor difclaimed its being done by his orders; and the king, finding that no fatisfaction was to obtained in the way of negotiation, refolved to feek it by the fword.

In the fpring of the year the crowns of France and The Ferch Denmark declared war against the emperor, who, con- army ratrary to the pope's advice, had made a fecond expedition wages into Africa, in hopes of ruining Algiers, and, inflead of Luxemthat, had ruined his own fleet and army. At the begin- Brabani. ning of fummer the French army, confifting of about forty or fifty thousand men, commanded by the duke of Orleans, and under him by the duke of Guife, entered the duchy of Luxemburgh, took Damvilliers, and afterwards Yvoi, which was a place of ftrength; Arlon furrendered next, and then the army invefted Luxemburgh, which, though ftrong and weil fortified, and provided with a good garrifon, furrendered in a few days; Vireton and Montmedi had the fame fate; and, if the young prince could have been prevailed upon to follow the duke of Guife's advice, the whole country would have been reduced, as the duke of Cleves ravaged Brabant to the very MOD. gates of Louvain and Antwerpe; but, on a fudden, he difmiffed his army, and went to his father at Montpellier. Rene de Naslau, prince of Orange, recovered Lucenburgh, and fome other places, and would have recovered all if it had not been for the duke of Guife, who defended Yvoi, and afterwards recovered Montmedi; while the prince of Orange, entering the duchy of Juliers, revenged upon that poor country the milchief which the duke of Cleves had done in Brabant. The dauphin's army, which was ftronger than that of his brother, having with them A.D. 1542. M. de Montpefat, marched into Roufillon, and befieged Perpignan<sup>d</sup>. The king expected that the emperor would have marched to its relief with an army, and, in that cafe, he would have put himfelf at the head of his own troops, in order to have given him battle : but the duke of Alba faved him the trouble; he threw himfelf into the place with fome bands of old Spanish foot, and finding the artillery, ammunition, and ftores, that remained after the Algerine expedition, defended the place fo well, that, after a fiege of three months, the king having fent Annebaut, now admiral of France, and the count de St. Paul, to fee how things flood, they advised him to defift from this enterprize; accordingly, towards the end of October, by the king's command, the fiege was raifed . The admiral then marched with part of the troops into Piedmont, where the French were this year on the defensive.

The emperor ferwed by Englifb auxiliaries. In the beginning of the month of March the army of the duke of Cleves, commanded by Martin du Roffem, defeated the emperor's forces, under the command of the duke of Arfcot, killed four thoufand upon the fpot, took five thoufand prifoners, and all their baggage and artillery. This action haftened the king into the field, who marched towards Cambray, and having taken the little town of Landrecy, ordered it to be fortified, and left in it a good garrifon. The duke of Orleans and the admiral Annebaut reduced the beft part of the duchy of Luxemburgh; but, in the mean time, the duke of Cleves being opprefied with the whole weight of the emperor's force, found himfelf under the necefity of making the beft terms he could, and was able to obtain no better, than that he fhould renounce his alliance with France, fend back Joan of Al-bret, and put part of his troops, under the command of his general before mentioned, into the emperor's fervice f. This was a fevere blow to the French intereft; but the alliance of Henry the Eighth with the emperor, which was the pure effect of the king's own imprudence, was a much greater, as it was immediately followed by the defcent of ten thousand men in the Low Countries, which having joined the emperor's army, induced him to lay fiege to Landrecy, though the king was yet in the field, and confequently in a condition to march to its relief. He had the good luck to relieve it twice by furprize, fo that the emperor was forced to retire both from before this place and Guife, inftead of marching to Paris, which he had threatened, after the junction of the English forces 5.

Captain Paulin, one of the king's agents, found means The calle to diffipate at the Porte the impreffions which the emperor of Nice Solyman had received of king Francis; and the grand fig- attacked by nior promised to fend a fleet into the Mediterranean, in and Turkthe proper feafon, on board which captain Paulin himfelf if feets. was to embark h. The French hiftorians are very much embarraffed in fpeaking of the treaties between their monarch and the foltan, and inveigh bitterly against Charles the Fifth, for expoling the king at the dyet as being clofely connected with infidels; nor are they lefs angry at the fame monarch's taking care to let Solyman underftand. that, by the help of a little condescension, he could have drawn this good ally of his, without receiving the leaft provocation from him, to have entered into an alliance for attacking, with all his forces, the Ottoman empire'. The truth is, Francis, if he could have gained the emperor, would have acted against the Turk; but, as he could not, he demanded the affiftance of the Turk against the emperor, and received it. Solyman in perfon entered Hungary, and fent the famous Barbaroffa, with a fleet of one hundred and thirty gallies, into the Mediterranean, where he put the city of Offia, and all the fea-coaft of the pope's territory, under terrible apprehensions, but without doing them any hurt, upon captain Paulin's declaring that they were under his mafter's protection *. gallies, commanded by Francis, count of Anguien, or Enghien, the fon of Charles, and brother of Anthony, duke of Vendofme, and then failed to the coaft of Nice, where they reduced the city of that name, but were not able to take the caffle, though they belieged it two months. Barbaroffa thewed an equal contempt for the French fleet and its commander; the former was fo ill equipped, that they were forced to borrow bullets, ammunition, and naval ftores from the Turks; and the count being but in his twenty-third year, Barbaroffa looked upon and treated him as a child; treatment which the count fhewed his judgment in bearing, and foon after made it evident, that old men, and even great men, might be mistaken. After this unfuccefsful expedition, the Turkish fleet came and wintered at Toulon, where Barbaroffa is faid to have exercifed his trade of piracy, without paying much respect even to the French flag; and, in the fpring, demanding the king's leave to depart, very readily received it 1. In Piedmont, after the departure of the Turkish and French gallies, the duke of Savoy and the marquis du Guaft took Mandovi, and, in breach of their capitulation, cut to pieces a great part of the Swifs garrifon, and plundered their baggage. Towards the close of the year Bouilieres, who commanded for the French, took St. Germain, and was on the point of taking Yvrée, which was a place of confequence; but finding himfelf fuperfeded, and the command given to the count d'Anguien, upon his fending to him for an efcort, Bouilieres marched to meet him with the whole army, and fo abandoned the fiege, rather than allow his fucceffor to have the honour of taking the place m.

Imperialifs defeated at Cerizolles. The views of Francis and Charles in this war were very different; and those of the former, in comparison of the latter, might be flyled infignificant. What he aimed at was the duchy of Milan, which, had he once acquired, he would have fat down contented; but Charles aimed at an afcendancy over all the powers of Europe, and to obtain this by the deftruction of France. Francis took his measures but indifferently for the gaining his little end; whereas Charles took his measures fo well, that he was very near carrying his point; fo that it may be truly faid, that Francis flaked his kingdom againft a duchy. At the dyet of Spire the emperor prevailed on the princes and flates of Germany, Proteflants as well as Papifts, to deelare the king an enemy to the empire, and to furnish him with an army of twenty-four thousand foot and four thoufand horfe, to carry on the war against him. At the fame time he folicited the pope to declare him an enemy to Christendom, and the Swifs to relinquish their alliance : if he had fucceeded in these points, the king would have been undone; as it was, he was very near it ". Henry the Eighth agreed with the emperor to attack France on one fide with fifty thousand men, while he, with a like number, entered it on the other, and, the two armies joining, were to march directly to Paris °. Francis was not ignorant of this defign; and yet, to gratify the ardour of the count of Anguien, who belieged Carignan, for the relieving of which the marquis du Guaft was affembling a great army, confented that he fhould give him battle. He did this against the advice of his council, who represented, that the fafety of France would be rifqued by that engagement; fince he had with him the flower of the French troops, and the king was under the greatest necessity of employing them in another place. Yet, weighty as thefe arguments were, they urged them in vain; the young general had the king's confent, and on the 14th of April he fought the battle of Cerizolles, in which he gained a complete victory against a superior army, killed ten thousand men upon the fpot, made three thoufand prifoners, and took the enemy's artillery, ammunition, and baggage. If this victory had been improved, the whole duchy of Milan might have been eafily conquered. It was not, indeed it could not be improved, for the king was obliged to recall the best part of the army to defend his frontiers, and even his capital. What was in the power of the count d'Anguien he did; he took Carignan, Moncalles, St. Damien, Vigon, Pont Pierre, and, which was still more, he put it out of the power of the Imperialists to attempt the invafion of France on this fide P; the only fignal advantage that arose from the victory.

Count William of Furstenberg, who had quitted the The gallant king's fervice upon fome difguft, befieged Luxemburgh on diferes of behalf of the emperor, and took it in a fortnight. Com-ruins the merci furrendered as foon as a breach was made. Ligny emperor's in Barrois was carried by affault, and then the emperor, army and with his army, invefted St. Dizier, a place of no great faves ftrength, but which was defended by M. la Lende and France.

M. du Bueil, count de Sancerre, who preferved it for fix weeks, and obtained a good capitulation at laft 9. Henry had landed at Calais in the month of May, but finding the emperor intent on taking towns, he followed his example, and invefted Montreuil and Boulogne at the fame time '. If they had held to their first propofal, and had joined their two armies before Paris, which would have confifted of eighty thousand foot, and twenty-two thousand horse, Francis must have abandoned his capital, and all the country on this fide the Loire; nay, if the emperor, after the taking of Luxemburgh, had marched to Paris, there was nothing to oppofe him; for the king, depending upon the defence that fortreis should have made, had not hastened the Swifs, fo that it was the defence of St. Dizier that, in this critical conjuncture, faved France. As foon as this place was taken the emperor fummoned Henry to march to Paris; but the king refused to ftir till he had taken Boulogne and Montreuil<sup>s</sup>. The emperor then advanced with his army, which was much reduced, fo far into Champagne, that he was in great danger of being defeated by the dauphin, or reduced to great diffrefs for want of provisions, if Epernai and Chateau Therrie, where the king's magazines were, had not been betrayed into his hands; and this event again threw the inhabitants of the city of Paris into fuch a confternation, that they fled on every fide. But the emperor, inftead of advancing towards that city, turned off to Soiffons, and entered into a treaty, to which he invited Henry, who refused to treat at all t.

Treaty of Crepi, in which Francis is ogain duped by Charles V. In order to understand this transaction, we must obferve, that the French court was divided into two factions; that of the dauphin, and that of his brother the duke of Orleans. The latter was his father's favourite, and the favourite alfo of Anne de Puissel, duchefs of Eftampes, the king's mistrefs, who had an inveterate hatred to Diana of Poictiers, the mistrefs of the dauphin. Charles the Fifth made that duchefs believe that he had a great affection for the duke of Orleans, and was very defirous of feeing him married to his daughter. This pretended inclination the dauphin treated as mere artifice; and, believing the danger over, and himfelf in a condition to make the emperor repent his invasion, was not at all inclined to peace; of which the duchefs feeing no hopes if the emperor was defeated, contrived things fo as to let the king's magazines fall into his hands. This event brought on the treaty of Crepi, by which the emperor promifed to give the duke of Orleans his own daughter, or his brother's daughter, and either the duchy of Milan or the Low Countries, with the counties of Burgundy and Charolois, and all the places taken fince the treaty of Nice, were to be reftored ". The king was the more eafily induced to tign this treaty, by the news of the lofs of Boulogne, a place ftrong, well fortified, fupplied with all things neceffary, and which had a numerous garrifon, commanded by Vervines, a young man, who, for his milconduct on this occasion, loft his head in the next reign. " As for Montreuil, which was old, ill fortified, and had but a fmall garrifon, the marshal de Biez preferved it; for half the duke of Norfolk's army that befieged it being composed of the emperor's troops, who quitted him upon the figning the treaty, he was obliged to retire *. Henry returned to England as foon as Boulogne A.D. 1544. furrendered. The dauphin understanding that the breaches were not repaired, made a bold attempt, recovered the lower town, and, if his troops had not fallen to plundering the English baggage, would have actually carried the place.

The dauphin was fo much displeased with the peace of Francis Crepi, that he protefted against it privately, as did the equips a parliament of Thouloute, as contrary to the dignity and fleet to inunalienable rights of the crown of France. Some re- vade Engmains of the ancient Vaudois being fettled in the villages of Merindol and Cabrieres, the former under the jurifdiction of the legate of Avignon, and the latter in the king's territories, certain zealots, making an ill use of their power, fell upon the poor people, and cut the throats of about fix thousand; for which barbarous deed fome of the principal authors were defervedly punished in the fuccceding reign v. The king being very defirous of recovering Boulogne, refolved to employ for that purpofe the whole forces of his kingdom by fea and land. Having taken into his fervice a confiderable number of thips from the Italian flates, he appointed the admiral Annebaut commander in chief of this puiffant navy, with a large number of land forces on board; but, before they failed, the king intended to give the ladies of his court a great feaft on board the admiral, which carried a hundred guns; but, by fome accident or other, in making preparations for this feaft, the fhip took fire, and, with most of the people on board her, perished z. The admiral, notwithstanding this accident, failed with his fleet, confifting of one hundred and twenty large fhips, and twenty-five gallies : their defign was to attack an English squadron which lay at Portfmouth, in which their gallies gave them a great advantage; but they found them fo fecurely posted, that, after a little cannonading, they declined attacking them. They next landed three different corps to ravage the lile of Wight, and held a council of war to deliberate whether they fhould fortify themselves there, which was at length determined in the negative. Leaving the Ifle of Wight, they made fome defcents upon the coaft, with little advantage, and then returned home<sup>2</sup>. The land army, under the command of the marshal de Biez, was not more fortunate; he was ordered to build a large fort that might command the entry of the harbour of Boulogne: but he built it where it was of no ufe, and fo fmall that it was forced to be pulled down. He forced, however, the lines of Oye, but did not profecute this fuccefs with effect. The king, who had brought his fon the duke of Orleans into Picardy, with an intent to be prefent at the fiege of Boulogne, had the mortification to find the feafon fo much advanced, and his army in fo bad a condition, A.D. 1545. that it was impracticable. An epidemic distemper reigning at this time, the young prince was feized with it, and died on the 8th of September, not without great fufpicion of poifon, to the inexpreffible grief of his father. The council of Trent was opened this year, to which the king fent ambaffadors, who were received and treated with great respect; but this did not confole him for the loss of his fon, and his difappointments in the war, which had coft him immenfe fums of money, levied in fuch a manner as grievoufly diftreffed his fubjects.

A peace concluded between France and England. The two kings were, by this time, tired of the war, and with equal reafon; it had anfwered the purpofes of neither, and was a heavy burthen on both. Henry's health was declining, and Francis alfo felt himfelf daily decay: their fubjects equally wifhed and needed a peace: but neverthelefs, the overtures that had been hitherto made for the conclution of it, had met with great difficulties. Francis infifted on the refitution of Boulogne, and that the Scots fhould be included as his allies; but Henry would not liften to either of these conditions. At length expedients were found, with refpect to the first, and Henry confented to the latter, with this qualification, that the Scots fhould give him no fresh provocations. The two admirals of France and England were the principal plenipotentiaries, and the peace was at length concluded, in the beginning of June, on terms which were hard enough upon Francis<sup>2</sup>. He confirmed former treaties; recognized the validity of ancient obligations, which he promifed to perform; contracted a new debt of eight hundred thouland crowns, for the reflitution and fortification of Boulogne, which was to be difcharged by annual payments in eight years, and the place to remain till that time in the hands of the English. Francis was as well pleafed with this as with the treaty of Crepi; they were neither of them favourable or honourable, but they were both neceffary. The king was very defirous to leave his dominions in fafety and in pcace : he was fenfible of former mifcarriages. and intended to repair them as far as was in his power. It was with this view that he vifited his frontiers, and directed feveral fortreffes to be repaired, especially on the fide of Germany, becaufe, under pretence of chaftifing the Protestants, the emperor was assembling a great army. When the admiral Annebaut demanded of him, after the death of the duke of Orleans, what his intentions were with regard to the duchy of Milan and the peace, he told him very roundly, that, as to the former, he looked upon himfelf to be under no obligation ; and that he would obferve the latter, unlefs he was provoked : which the king understood to be, when he found himself in a condition to break it with advantage. In this fituation Francis might have availed himfelf, as his fucceffors afterwards did, by a clofe alliance with the Protestants in Germany; but from this expedient, he was diffuaded by cardinal A.D.1546. Tournon, who likewife prevailed upon him to revive religious perfecutions in his own dominions, which rendered him unquiet at home, and ruined his reputation abroad ; at the fame time that it diverted him from what he had once defigned, the reformation of the numerous abufes, that, through his own indolence, his frequent necessities, and the advice of bad miniiters, had been introduced during his reign.

At

Death of which is quickly followed by that of Francis.

At the beginning of the enfuing year, being at St. Ger-Henry VIII. main en Laye, he received the news of the death of Henry VIII. his grief for which, fome writers fay, was the caufe of his own b; for, notwithstanding their frequent quarrels, thefe two monarchs had a great affection for each other, as well as great refemblance, being nearly of a height, having the fame air, the fame tone of voice, and the fame inclinations : Henry was, of the two, fomewhat older. Francis had reckoned much upon his affiftance, in cafe of being attacked by the emperor, and upon his death, altered his fentiments with regard to the Protestants in Germany, with whom he faw it abfolutely neceffary for him to unite : but, before he could proceed far in these or any other of his schemes, he found himself attacked by a flow fever, occafioned by a malady brought upon him by his pleafures. He fought relief from exercife and change of place, but in vain; and as he went from one country palace to another, he found himfelf fo ill at Rambouillet, that he began to prepare for death, which he received with great composure of mind, advising his fon to imitate him in his good qualities, if he had any, and to avoid his vices and foibles, which were but too numerous and too apparent c. He recommended to him the admiral in very ftrong terms, and diffuaded him from recalling the conftable. These injunctions had little effect; for they were forgot before he was well in his coffin. He deceased on the last day of March<sup>d</sup>, in the fifty-third year of his age, and the thirty-third of his reign, and, with all his faults, was univerfally regretted by his fubjects (G). We need the lefs wonder at this when we reflect.

At his meals, in his recreations, and at night, before he went to fleep, he had perfons who read to him, and it was by these means that he gained fo general an acquaintance with the fciences (3). He was magnificent in every thing, and not only introduced the belles lettres, but a tafte for the fine arts. He built many royal palaces, fuch as Fontainbleau. St. Germaine en Laye, Chambard, the caffle of Madrid in the wood of Boulogne, and he laid the foundation of the Louvre (4). In the first part of his life he was profuse, but however it was in a noble way; his palaces were richly furnished; he had as fine jewels and finer pictures than most of the princes of his time. There was not an able officer. or an accomplifhed fcholar, of whom he had any knowlege, but he either gave, or at least offered, him a penfion. ## HENRY II.

Henry II. breaks through all his father's injunctions.

HENRY II. acceded to the throne the very day-that he became twenty-nine years of age, with great expectations of the whole French nation : it is faid that his father exhorted him in his laft moments to confider the admiral Annebaut as one of his ableft and moft faithful fervants; to withdraw his confidence from the conftable, whom he fufpected of holding a correspondence with Charles V. and to keep a ftrict eye over the princes of the house of Lorrain e. Henry, to gratify his own inclinations, or to fhew that he was a king, broke every one of these injunctions. He difgraced Annebaut, and deprived him of his employments, without fo much as affigning a caufe ; he recalled the conftable immediately, and he took the duke of Guife and his children into his council<sup>f</sup>. His coronation was celebrated at Rheims, on the 26th of July, where the fix ancient peers were reprefented by fix of the new, and the duke of Guife had precedency of the duke to fuffer his paffion to defeat his fucceffion. In his youth he had a mistrefs whose name was Cureau, by whom he was thought to have been the father of Stephen Dolet, who fuffered an infamous death for impiety. By another lady, whofe name is not mentioned, he had a fon, who took the name of Vilecouvin. His amour with Frances de Foix, countefs of Chateaubriant, made a great noife. He had another gallantry which was equally fatal to himfelf and his mistrefs; she was a married woman, and the hufband's refentment induced him to give her a difeafe, of which fhe died miferably, and the king, after languishing for many years, owed his death to the fame caufe. His last mistres was Anne de Pisseleu, who, at her coming to court, was flyled mademoiselle d'Helli. The duchess of Estampes, finding herfelf neglected and despifed, retired to her caftle in the country, and became a zealous Protestant; but Diana of Poictiers, the widow of Lewis de Breze, whom the king created duchefs of Valentinois h, directed all at her will, and was the principal caufe of fo many changes. The chancellor was difgraced, though he could not be deprived, and the feals, in process of time, were given to John Bertrandi. The cardinal de Tournon was turned out of the council, to make way for the duke of Aumale, fon to the duke of Guife. The two fecretaries of flate were difmiffed, and many others i. The king, though he is reprefented as a good-natured prince, made fome ex-amples likewife. Edward du Biez, marshal of France, was not only difgraced, but, by a fentence pronounced upon him for his want of conduct, or rather for his want of faccefs, in the late reign, was degraded from his office and imprisoned. His son-in-law Jaques de Couci, lord of Vervines, loft his head for furrendering Boulogne to the English, when the fuccours were almost in fight; but this fentence was not executed till two years after, the procefs being fo long dependingk.

The new king, after his coronation, made the tour of Permits a his frontiers, and, at his return, permitted a duel on a duel in his private quarrel, occafioned by their amours, between Guy prefence, Chabot, lord of Jarnac, and Francis de Vivonne, lord of news his Chasteneraye : the former was but just recovered from a alliance fit of ficknefs; the latter was an active vigorous man, for with the whom the king had a great affection. The court was pre- cantons. fent, as was fome time the cuftom on fuch occasions, when, contrary to all expectation, Vivonne was borne to the ground by Jarnac, and fo much enraged at his difgrace, that, obstinately refusing to have his wounds dreffed, he died in defpair; at which event the king was fo much troubled, that he is faid to have made a vow never to permit any thing of this kind again<sup>1</sup>. The queen-dowager being defirous to retire into the dominions of her brother, the king made no difficulty of giving his confent, and, at the fame time, fettled to her fatisfaction her jointure, which confifted of the revenues of Touraine and Poitou. The ministers, apprehending that the refidence of twelve cardinals at court might be prejudicial to their interests, and bring too many ecclesiaftics into the council, the king, under colour of doing honour to pope Paul III. fent no lefs than feven of them to Rome, where they were directed to use all possible methods to promote the king's intereft, and to thwart the views of the emperor m. The delivery of the queen being expected towards the close of the year, the king directed his ambaffadors to intreat the Swifs cantons, as a mark of their kindnefs and friendthip, to affift, in quality of fponfors, at the baptifm of his child; to which propofal they readily affented, and named ambaffadors to give their attendance at this ceremony, which they did in the month of December, when the young princefs, who was named Claude after her grandmother, was carried to church by one of the ambaffadors. This ftep was intended to fignify to the world the clofe conjunction there was between the crown of France and the Swifs cantons, and to make way for renewing the alliance upon fuch terms as were most convenient for the king's defigns; a project which was also, though at fome diftance of time, brought about"; only the cantons of Zurich and Berne abfolutely refused to be included in this new alliance, on account of the great feverities that were daily exercifed in France against their brethren the Protestants.

Sends fuccours to the Scots, and, during his abfence in Piedmont, an infurrection breaks out in Guienne.

The king, as a fresh mark of his favour, made Francis duke of Aumale a peer of France; and it was afcribed to the influence of that family, as well as to the politics of those times, that the king determined to fend a fleet, with fix thousand good troops on board, under the command of the lord d'Este, to the relief of the Scots. The queendowager was the daughter of the duke of Guife, and the fifter of the duke of Aumale; fhe had vigoroufly promoted the views of France, in hindering the marriage of her infant daughter with king Edward of England, and had, by thefe means, embarked the nation in a war, which had brought them to the brink of ruin. The fending this fuccour, whatever it might do to the Scots, clearly answered the king's intention, as it enabled the French party in Scotland to execute what they had long intended, the fending over their queen Mary, a child of fix years old, to be educated at the court of France °, a circumftance which loft her the love of her fubjects, and was the true fource of all her misfortunes. The king made another progrefs this fummer through Piccardy, Champagne, Burgundy, Savoy, and at length paffed into Piedmont. His defign was to fee that all his frontier places were in a good flate of defence, his forces complete, and to give countenance to his friends in Italy, where he was very defirous of reviving his pretentions to feveral countries. Befides his jealoufy of Charles V. now at the very fummit of his greatnefs, his perfonal refentment was ftronger against him than that of his father, on account of fome ill ufage he had received when he was a hoftage at Madrid. In the courfe of this progrefs, he caufed the marriage of the heirefs of Navarre to be celebrated at Moulins, where Anthony duke of Vendofme efpouled the princels Joan of Albret, whom Francis I. had given in marriage to the duke of Cleves, and who, through the terror of the emperor's arms, had been forced to fend her back P. While the king was thus employed, and had his thoughts chiefly occupied with foreign affairs, there broke out, very unexpectedly, a kind of civil war at home. It first appeared at Saintonge, and in the Angoulmois, but quickly fpread itfelf through all Guienne, and was owing to the impatience of the people in regard to the falttax 9; for falt being the natural product of their own country, and confidered as the peculiar bleffing of Providence. derived to them without labour, by the influence of the fun upon the fea, they thought the tax very oppreflive ; but it was the infolence of the officers which rendered it intolerable. In this revolt the clergy and nobility had little fhare ; the grievance did not fall upon them, and the people, as is commonly the cafe, though their caufe was in itfelf worthy of compaffion, rendered themfelves, by their conduct, inexcufable, committing the most horrid acts of barbarity, and treating as enemies all who declined taking their method of expreshing their refentment. At length the flame of fedition caught the city of Bour- A D.1548. deaux, where, notwithstanding all the care that could be taken by the magistrates, and in spite of the remonstrances of the parliament, the populace first besieged the king's lieutenant M. de Monems, in the citadel, and, when they had drawn him forth upon the public faith, that all pof-

The king, at his return, ordered two corps of troops, one commanded by the conftable. the other by the duke of Aumale, to reduce the revolted provinces to their duty. The duke took the higher road. and paffing through Saintonge, with fair words, and making a very few examples, brought every thing into perfect order . The conftable took his route by the feafide ; and though the city of Bourdeaux opened her gates, and fent deputies to meet him, he would not enter otherwife than by a breach made in their walls, posted his troops in all parts, as if the place had been taken by ftorm, with cannon pointed at the head of every ftreet; and, after a fhort process, declared the citizens had forfeited all their privileges, which he caufed to be burned. He feized their bells, as well as their records; declared all their privileges forfeited; hanged up one hundred fubftantial tradeimen; difarmed the reft; fined them in two hundred thousand livres; and finished the process by fuspending the parliament from the exercise of their functions<sup>t</sup>. Some fay his refentment was sharpened on account of Monems, who was his near relation; and indeed there is fome appearance of it, for he caufed the town-houfe to be demolished, and a chapel to be erected over it, where a folemn fervice was to be faid annually for the foul of the deceased; the magistrates, with a hundred of the principal inhabitants, were obliged to dig his body out of the grave with their nails, which was then carried in great pomp to the church of St. Andrew, and there interred. upwards of five thousand citizens attending the ceremony with torches. The king remitted a great part of these penalties; but the different conduct of his officers had a ftrange effect: the conftable remained ever afterwards odious to the people; the family of Guife began from that moment to reign in their hearts. The king caufed the edicts against the Protestants to be executed with the utmost feverity; and erected a chamber on purpose, compofed of members of the parliament of Paris, becaufe he found the clergy too mild in the profecution of herefy.

In the month of February, the king was bleffed with another fon, who had the name of Lewis, and the title of Orleans, beftowed on him ". The aftrologers, who were in those days in great vogue, promised mighty things on The king the behalf of this young prince ; but, as he died under proceeds three years of age, they gained no great credit by these Jewerely predictions. The factions in the court of England, and proteflants, the popular infurrections in the country, infpired the king and fails with the hopes of recovering Boulogne eafily. He refolved in his atto attack it by furprize, the nobility having fecret orders to tempt on bring with them a great number of gens d'arms, when they came to attend the ceremony of the queen's coronation and public entry, which was fixed for the month of June. It was performed with great magnificence "; but the fplendour of it was quickly clouded by proceedings of a different nature; for it was at this time that the lord of Vervines fuffered, and his head and quarters were placed on the French forts nearest to Boulogne. After this execution followed a folemn proceffion, which was clofed by the burning of many Protestants. The king was himfelf prefent at this dreadful spectacle, which, however, shocked him to fuch a degree, that he could never forget it, but complained, as long as he lived, that, at certain times, it feemed before his eyes, and troubled his understanding *. About the beginning of August, all things being ready, and Strozzi, with the French fleet, having attacked the Englifh near Guernfey, with fome advantage, the French forces attacked and carried all the advanced pofts of the English about Boulogne; notwithstanding which fucces, and the prefence of the king, the conftable, the dukes of Vendofme and Aumale, the place was fo gallantly defended, that they were confirained to change the fiege into a blockade y, after war had been proclaimed against England, as a fort of justification of this enterprize. At A.D.1549. the close of the year died Margaret queen of Navarre, the king's aunt, whofe engaging manners and great abilities had rendered her admired throughout Europe. She had shewn to much zeal for the new opinions, as occasioned their fpreading in France, and, as far as fhe could, protected their professors.

On the humble application of the people of Bourdeaux, Boulogne the king reftored them to his favour, and the parliament is yielded, to its functions: they were likewife permitted, upon the and a peace payment of a fum of money, to withdraw their bells from with Engthe fortreffes to which they had been carried, at the time land. that city was punished by the constable. Boulogne, which had continued all this time, alarmed the new government of England, where John Dudley, earl of Warwick, and afterwards duke of Northumberland, had fupplanted the protector Somerfet. This minister not knowing how to relieve it, at the fame time that money was much wanted, a treaty was fet on foot for the fale of it; to which propofal king Henry readily liftened: the negociation was quickly concluded, by which it was agreed, that the place fhould be yielded to France, upon the payment of four hundred thousand crowns, one half on the day of reflitution, and the other before the middle of August following: Scotland was included, where the English restored what they had taken, and the claims of both parties were reciprocally referved in general terms, and hoftages given on both fides for the due performance of articles 2. This was the most advantageous peace that France had hitherto made with England; the vaft arrears that were due from that crown being, in effect, remitted, and those pensions, which looked fo like tribute, for want of being mentioned, in effect ex-. tinguished. The earl of Warwick himfelf was fo fenfible of the difgrace his nation had fuffered by this feandalous bargain, that he pretended to be fick, to avoid fetting his hand to the ratification. A peace being proclaimed, to thew that a thorough understanding was reftored between the two courts, it was agreed to exchange their orders. Accordingly the marshal de St. André, the king's favourite, was fent with that of St. Michael to king Edward, and the Garter was fent in return to Henry<sup>a</sup>. Claude duke of Guife, and his brother John, cardinal of Lorrain, dving, Francis duke of Aumale affumed the title of duke of Guife, and his brethren, Charles and Lewis, both cardinals, were flyled, the former of Lorrain, and the latter of Guife b. An edict was made to reftrain the extravagant remittances the clergy were obliged to make to Rome, and for correcting other abufes committed by the papal notaries, with which ordinance pope Julius III. of the house of Caraffa, who had succeeded Paul, was highly displeasede. Charles de Cosse, count of Brisac, one of the gallanteft and handfomeft men in France, was fent to command in Piedmont, in the absence of the prince of Melfi, that he might be out of the fight of the duchefs of Valentinois; and the prince dying foon after, he fucceeded

The taxes were at this time fo high, that the D.A.1550. country people reforted in crowds to Paris to avoid them, by betaking themfelves to trades; and the king published an edict to reftrain additional buildings, being apprehenfive the city fhould become too large.

The scheme of pope Paul III. had been to ag- and the grandize his family. He had first given his natural fon emberer. Peter Lewis Farnele the city of Camarino, with the title of duke, which he afterwards exchanged for Parma and Placentia. This fon of the pope's was one of the most profligate men in the world, and had pushed his brutality fuch a length, that his fubjects confpired against him and killed him: upon which Ferdinand Gonzagua, who governed for the emperor in the duchy of Milan, feized Placentia. This duke left behind him three fons, Alexander the eldeft, on whom his grandfather had beftowed a hat ; Octavio, the fecond fon, had married the emperor's daughter, who, notwithstanding, would not reftore to him Placentia, or even confent that he fhould keep Parma ; Horatio, the third fon, had the duchy of Caftro, and the king had confented that he fhould marty his natural daughter Diana. The pope, in order to adjust things as well as he could, had formed a plan of accommodation, by which Octavio was to guit Parma, and confeat that it fhould be united to the dominions of the holy fee, a propofal which he refused in fo peremptory a manner, that, upon reading his letter, the old pontiff fell into fo high a paffion, as brought on a fever, which carried him to his grave f. Julius III. had been chofen by the French faction, and the creatures of his predeceffor, with whom he acted at first, but quickly entered into schemes for the emperor, and laboured to difpoffels Octavio Farnele of Parma, as well as fome other Italian princes, which perfecution threw them into the arms of the king, who declared his refolution to protect them. The pope then became very angry, and, under pretence that Parma was a fief belonging to the church, and that Octavio Farnele was a rebel, declared war against him, and demanded the affistance of the emperor to reduce him : the king, who had all along determined to fupport him, fent proper orders to the marfhal de Brifac, who, upon Gonzagua's befieging Parma, gave the duke fuch effectual fuccours as faved the place z.

He renders himfelf odicus by calling in the Turks.

The war being carried on in the name of the pope, and the emperor acting as his auxiliary, Julius threatened the king with the cenfures of the church, more especially after the Turks entered into the war, and fent a powerful fleet into the Mediterranean, where they threatened the ifland of Malta, ruined that of Gozo, and made descents upon Sicily. Charles the Fifth alfo made loud complaints, that, for granting fuccours to the holy fee, the French king had committed hoftilities against him, and, after the example of his father, had called in the Turks. Henry vindicated himfelf, by fhewing that the emperor had given the Turks fufficient provocation; and many of the French writers ftill infift upon this argument, and treat the emperor's complaints as calumnies; whereas, in truth, their own excufes are trivial, and can make no impreffion upon any that are not difposed to believe any thing that can be alleged in favour of the French monarch; and what they urge as the ftrongeft proof, that Henry did not call in the infidels to his affiftance, becaufe the French ambaffador on board the Turkish fleet interposed with effect, in favour of the order of Malta, is the fulleft and cleareft teftimony to the contrary; fince, if the king had not been in clofe alliance with the Ottoman Porte, his ambaffador would not have been there, or if he had, would not have been able to prefcribe to a Turkish admiral. This diversion had all the confequences that were expected from it; the emperor would not fupport the pope as he intended, and Julius, whole complaifance for the emperor role entirely from the high opinion of his power, as foon as he found himself mistaken in that particular, began to lay aside his rough language, and confider how to get out of a quarrel which had already exhaufted his finances h.

Pope Julius fues for peace. The king no fooner determined to enter into a war with the pope than he very wifely refolved to prevent his enemies from drawing fupplies out of his dominions, and, for that reafon, forbid by an edict the fending of money to Rome on any pretence, which was almoft as great a blow to Julius as the military operations of marfhal Brifac, who made war with infinitely more prudence, better difcipline, and more fuccefs, than any of the French generals had formerly difplayed in this part of the world 4. To qualify this conduct, and to thew that, though he was an enemy to the pope, he was as zealous as ever for the church of Rome, the king published at Chateaubriant, a flaming edict against the Protestants k. The barony of Montmorency was erected into a duchy and peerage, in favour of the conftable, who fill continued at the head of affairs. In the month of October, he negociated, by the bifhop of Bayonne, a league with the Protestant princes of the empire against Charles, by which it was flipulated, that the king thould pay down two hundred and forty thoufand crowns for the expences of the three first months of the war, and fixty thousand crowns towards the fame expences every month after the war was declared, for reftoring the liberties of Germany; neither party was to treat feparately; and the king was to take into his poffeffion, by way of fecurity for the just performance of this alliance, Cambray, or the cities of Metz, Toul, and Verdun, and to hold them with the title of vicar of the empire 1. Pope Julius, to fhew his ftrong defire of peace, A.D. 1551. fent, towards the close of the year, a legate to Paris; and the king, who, during his quarrel, affected to support the rights of the Gallican church, not only obliged this legate to fend his powers to be recognized by the parliament, but alfo to fignify to that illustrious body in writing, that he was content to execute them according to the reftrictions made by the parliament, and not otherwife ". The reader will discern from hence, that, as the interests of the court dictated, the parliament or the pontiff prevailed.

At the very opening of the year, the king ratified his The king treaty with the German princes, and levied immenfe fums feizes on of money upon his fubjects, by a variety of opprefive mea-fures. tion to the people, the admiral Annebaut, who had been lately recalled to court, was directed to affift her. At the king's entrance into Lorrain he was met by the duchefsdowager, who was the emperor's niece, whom the king treated with great civility; but on his arrival at Nancy. he told her plainly, that, as it was a point of importance to have that country in the hands of a friend, he must endeavour to fecure it for the future, by fending the young duke her fon to be educated at Paris, and, for the prefent, by putting the administration into the hands of bis uncle the count de Vaudemont ". The cities of Toul and Verdun opened their gates ; Metz made fome feruple ; but the conftable took them fo unprepared, that the citizens could not refift °. The truth is, the princes of the houfe of Lorrain fettled in France, that is, Francis duke of Guife, his brother Claude, to whom he had yielded the duchy of Aumale, and the two cardinals, one of whom was bishop of Verdun, forgetting the regard due to their family and to their country, promoted to their utmost the reduction of these places, by which the empire was deprived of its barrier, and the poffellion of Lorrain rendered thenceforward precarious.

The princes of the empire and the Swifs oblige him to defift from his enterprize.

The king next extended his conquefts into Alface, taking every thing that had an appearance of ftrength between Haguenau and Wiffembourgh; he made also an attempt upon Strafburgh, that he might have the command of the Rhine; but in this he failed; for the inhabitants, reflecting on the fate of Metz, had formed a garrifon of nine thousand men, and were not either to be cheated or threatened out of their liberties. The confederate princes alfo, being defirous to ftop his farther progefs, intreated him to be content, and not give occasion to his and their enemies to fay, that the prince whom they flyled the protector, was become the oppreffor of the liberties of Germany. The Swifs, who were no lefs apprehenfive of his entering their territories, fent deputies to make him a compliment of the like nature, which he received very gracioully, and took a refolution to retire, as if it had been in compliance with their requefts. This was a very high ftroke of policy, and founded upon very different motives; he knew that the confederate princes were treating with the emperor; he had a proper fenfe of the advantages already gained, which he refolved to keep; and found it neceffary to provide for the fafety of his own dominions, Mary queen of Hungary, governets of the Low Countries, having fent Martin Roffem into Champagne, where he committed moft dreadful depredations P. The king made a turn, however, through the duchy of Luxemburgh, where he took Damvilliers, Ivoy, and Montmody, and furnished Robert de la Mark with a body of forces, with which he recovered Bouillon, that had been taken from his grandfather by the emperor, thirty-one years before. But through the fatigue he fuffered in this expedition, the king was feized with a fever, which almost brought him to the grave at Sedan 9.

In Italy the flame of war was flopped; the marshal de Charles V. brifac, though his army was far from being numerous, brifages had feized the city of Sienna, and gained fo many advan-is forced to tages, that the pope, who had concluded a truce with raife the him for two years, inclined rather to his fide; and the fiege with emperor very wifely taking advantage of his having hitherto 10/1. acted only as an auxiliary, defired to be included in that truce, which left the family of Farnele in pollellion of the duchy of Parma . He knew that, whenever the circumftances of things in Italy would permit, he might revive this quarrel; and, being at prefent attentive only to the recovery of what had been taken from the empire, he was very defirous of being fecure on this fide, where, with the affiftance of the Turks, he was apprehensive the French might make the conqueit of the kingdom of Naples. Henry having carried his own point in Italy, readily confented to the truce, without confulting the intereft of his infidel allies. The princes of the empire acted precifely from the fame motives; they had obtained all they could , defire by the treaty of Paffau, and therefore made no fcruple of leaving their troops at the difpolition of the emperor, Albert of Brandenburgh only excepted. Charles, with twelve thoufand horfe, one hundred thoufand foot, and a numerous train of artillery, came before Metz, towards the end of October '. The place was large, and fo poorly fortified, that he might reafonably have hoped it would make but little refiftance. The duke of Guife threw himfelf into it with two princes of his houfe, three princes of the blood, fifty noblemen of the first rank, five hundred gentlemen of quality on horfeback, with their followers, and five thousand of the best infantry in France.

While

While the fiege lafted, Albert of Brandenburgh, having adjuited, things with the emperor, furprifed a good corps of troops, under the command of the duke d'Aumale, and put great part of them to the fword; fo that the garrifon of Metz was equally deprived of fuccour, and of the hopes of any diversion in their favour '. The count de Roeux carried the war into Picardy, with all the circumflances of rage and fury imaginable, made himfelf mafter of Noyon, Roye, Neile, Chauny, and burnt the royal palace of Folembray. The Parifians were fo alarmed that they demanded the king's leave to fortify on the fide of Picardy, which he gave them, provided they did it at their own expence ". Thus the emperor had all the leifure and all the advantages he could defire in carrying on the fiege. But the advanced fe fon of the year, perpetual fallies from the place, the indefatigable attention of the duke of Guife, and his great military abilities, rendered all his attempts vain; fo that, after lying before it two months, during which his army was leffened one third, he did not judge it expedient to proceed to an affault, though there were breaches on every fide; but on the contrary, finding the difeafes and diffreffes to which his army was exposed multiply every day, he was confirmed to decamp ". The duke of Guife might have deftroyed great part of his forces in their retreat; but he generously cauled them to be picked up in the roads and villages, and fent to the hofpitals, being ashamed, after having defeated an imperial army, to ftain the glory of his arms with the blood of difeafed and dying men. The city of Metz, which has remained ever fince in the hands of the French, has never recovered its former fplendor; for, in order to his defence, the duke of Guife found himfelf obliged to demolifh thirty convents and churches in and about the city, in fome of which were the tombs of feveral of the kings of the Carlovingian race, whofe remains were, with the formality of a folemn procession, removed.

The empevor takes and razes Terouenne and Hefding and tempts the fiege of Cambray in vain.

He used incredible diligence in recruiting his army, fo that the next fummer the count de Roeux invested Terouenne, with numerous forces; the place was ftrong, but very ill provided, and the garrifon fmall. The French army was not able to take the field, though in the month of June; but Andrew Mantalabert, lord d'Effe, who had commanded with great reputation in Scotland, and who had faved France by the defence of Landrecy in the former reign, was ordered to throw himfelt into it with a handful of brave men. While the articles of capitulation were regulating, the German and Flemish foldiers surprised fome weak posts. and, entering the town, put not only the garriion, but the inhabitants, men, women, and children, to the fword. The Spaniards, with fome difficulty, faved the principal officers; but the emperor carried his refentment fo far, as to deftroy the city to its very foundations, fo that at prefent there are fcarce any difcernible marks of its ruins z. The count de Roeux being dead, the command of the imperial army fell to Cæfar Poncede Lalain, lord of Biencourt; but the emperor, believing it would be more for his advantage to have his army commanded by a perfon of fuperior rank, replaced him by Emanuel Philibert, prince of Piedmont. His first enterprize was the fiege of Hefdin, where the marshal de la Mark commanded, who was fonin-law to Diana de Poitiers. Horatio Farnefe, duke of Caftro, the folemnization of whofe marriage with the king's natural daughter, Diana had employed the French court, while the emperor was forcing their barrier, threw himfelf into this place, with fifty perfons of quality; notwithstanding which reinforcement the prince of Piedmont conducted his enterprize with fo much diligence and vigour, that the marshal was forced to capitulate. While they were treating, a prieft throwing a granade at random, it fell into a mine, by which the caftle was blown up, and the duke of Caftro, and many other perfons of diffinction. were buried in the ruins. garrifon to the fword. Henry was marching to the relief of the place, at the head of a complete army, confifting of ten thoufand excellent cavalry, and fifty-four thoufand foot, with a train of a hundred pieces of cannon; yet this mighty force performed nothing worth mentioning, except defeating a corps of Flemifh cavalry, making the duke of Arfcot, who commanded them, with about five hundred men, prifoners, and killing about fix hundred more, amongft whom was the prince of Epinoy; for prince Philibert declined a battle, and prevented the fiege of Cambray, a circumftance which fo chagrined the conftable that he fell fick, and the French army went into winter-quarters. The people murmured exceedingly, but without fhaking the credit of the favourite <sup>a</sup>.

The war in Italy carried on between the king and the emperor.

The truce in Italy was broke almost as foon as concluded; for the emperor thought it practicable to recover Sienna. with the affiftance of the duke of Tufcany, and the prince of Salerno perfuaded the French that it was very poffible for them to become masters of the kingdom of Naples. Thefe defigns reciprocally defeated each other; the Turkifh fleet, commanded by the corfair Dragut and Sinan Bafha. came time enough on the coafts of the kingdom of Naples to oblige the Imperialists to raife the fiege of Sienna, but the prince of Salerno did not reach that fleet fo early as to excite a revolt in Naples b. Monfieur de Termes, who -had defended Sienna, made, with the affiftance of the Turkish and French fleet, which had defeated that of Andrew Doria, an attempt on Corfica, and reduced the whole island, except Calvi; but, fome difference arifing between him and Dragut, the Turkish fleet retired, and the Genoefe recovered all except Fiorenzo, and the fouth part of the ifland. The marshal de Brifac took several places in Piedmont, and introduced a new method of making war, which has been but little imitated. The peafants were exempted on both fides from injuries, and people paffed through the feat of war about their bulinefs. with as much fecurity as in time of full peace . Edward the Sixth of England, being in a very declining condition, and the French ministers having intelligence of the emperor's views, Anthony de Noailles was sent over to affure the duke of Northumberland of the king's affiftance, which ferved only to animate him to an enterprize, which had

Pope Julius thought it became him to endeavour at Henry inleast to effectuate a peace. But the emperor infifted on vales the very high terms, which king Henry thought it difhonour- Low Counable for him fo much as to hear; fo that, inftead of a tries with treaty, the pope's propositions did not fo much as produce music a negociation. What chiefly raifed the emperor's fpirits fo much, was the conclusion of the marriage between his fon Philip and queen Mary of England, in fpite of all the endeavours of France, as well as contrary to the inclinations of the English. This, however, did not hinder Henry from fending monfieur de Noailles, who had been employed to defeat her fucceffion, to compliment queen Mary upon her marriage . Cardinal Pole, in his paffage through France, employed his eloquence to foften things between both princes, but to little purpofe, though the king testified great esteem for his perfon. The remembrance of what had paffed the preceding year engaged Henry not only to guard against a furprize, but to labour all that was in his power to be in the field before the emperor; and having affembled, in different places, fixty thousand men, he entered the dominions of that prince with three different armies; the first commanded, under himfelf, by the conftable, the fecond by the duke of Vendofme, and the third by the marshal de St. André f. The constable, having deceived the emperor's generals, appeared unexpectedly before Marienburgh, a new town, to which queen Mary of Hungary had given her own name, and there he was joined by the other two armies; the place being but indifferently provided, the governor and officers were made prisoners of war. The king was so much pleafed with his conqueft, that he was refolved to keep it; and, with this view, not only placed a garrifon there, but alfo, to facilitate the correspondence with his own territories, fortified Rocroi. . In the beginning of July, the king took Bovines by affault; and the duke de Vendofme reduced Dinant.

The emperor having put himfelf at the head of his army, the king, who was very defirous of bringing him to a battle, wasted all the country, and rafed Maubeuge, he head of furmounted by a beautiful caffle, and Mariemont a pleafant country palace of the queen before mentioned, which was the reason that the king burnt the one, and beat the other to pieces, as he likewife did the caftle of Roeux, in refentment of the ravages committed by the queen's order, and particularly for demolishing his favourite palace of Folembray z. A deep-rooted antipathy prevailed between Mary and Henry. which, after venting itfelf in fongs and lampoons, that were indecent, produced at length these inhuman acts of violence. How much foever the emperor might be difpleafed at a war carried on in this manner, he could not be brought to fight with any advantage. The king, therefore, having wafted the country about Cambray, paffed through the country of Artois, and, towards the end of July, invefted the caftle of Renty, from whence the emperor's fubjects had made frequent excursions into the country of Boulogne h. Charles, who had under him Philibert duke of Savoy, and Ferdinand Gonzague, advanced to its relief, and encamped to clofe to the French army, that there was only a narrow valley between them. On the 13th of August, there happened a fmart action, in which the king diffinguished himfelf perfonally at the head of the Swifs, and the duke of Guife, who is the favourite hero of the French writers, gained a confiderable advantage i. The field of battle, firewed with two thousand dead bodies, a confiderable number of ftandards and colours, and a few pieces of cannon, were the proofs of this victory, which, it is faid, might have been more complete, if the conftable had been more lively in his motions. It feems he remembered the battle of Pavia, and, with a fuperior army in his front, and a ftrong garrifon in his rear, was unwilling to run any rifk. What offends the French still more, he prevailed upon the king, a few days after, to raife the fiege, and to retire before the emperor. But a better judge than they thought otherwife; for when a great lord went to vifit the emperor Charles in his retreat, and told him that he had adorned his gallery with the pictures of his military exploits, and particularly his laft, which was the flight of the French from Renty, Charles anfwered gravely and gently, " Then you must fet your painter to correct it; for inftead of a flight it was a gallant and foldier-like retreat, in day-light, and in good order k." After this the army went into winter-quarters. having added fome places to the French territories, and much to the fecurity of the frontiers.

On the fide of Italy a new scene opened. Cosmo de The French Medicis, duke of Tufcany, who had acted covertly as an defeated in auxiliary, or rather as a feudatory to the emperor, per-lialy, and ceiving clearly that he ran as great hazard, without being fieged. able to reap fo great advantage, as if he declared openly against the French, and exerted his whole force, first made a good bargain with the emperor, and then did what his interest would have prompted him to, if he had made no bargain at all. He fet on foot a numerous army, the command of which he gave to the marquis de Marignan. who was defirous of being thought the duke's relation 1. The point he aimed at was to reduce Sienna, where Peter Strozzi commanded, an excellent officer, but unfortunate, because he was obstinate. The marquis belieged it in vain; he changed his fiege into a blockade to as little purpole. Strozzi, leaving the command of the place to Montluc, marched with nine or ten thousand men into the duke's territories, and befieged Marciano. The marquis advanced to the relief of the place, and the fituation of the armies was much the fame as between the French and Imperialists at Reaty m. Want of water forced Strozzi to decamp: it was much against his will, and he fent a courier to Montluc, to demand his fentiments, whether it was best to retire by night or by day. Montluc, whole bravery was as little queffioned as his abilities, answered, " That is best which is fafest." But, notwithstanding this advice, Strozzi had his head fo full of the point of honour, that he made his retreat before a fuperior army, in open day, and was thoroughly defeated with the loss of four thousand men, his baggage, and artillery. It was this misfortune that induced the conftable to raife the fiege of Renty. The marshal Strozzi preferved, however, Sienna for this year ". Monfieur de Termes kept his ground in Corfica, and the marshal de Brifac made himself master of Joree in four days. The French ambaffador at Rome protefted against the investiture which the pope gave to Philip of Austria of the kingdom of Naples. At the very

The campaign in Italy ed with variety of fortune.

The city of Sienna, the fiege of which was continued through the winter, was defended with great courage and conftancy by Montluc, who prevailed upon the inhabiand attend. tants to refift both force and famine, and to encounter a variety of deaths, from the fole hope of preferving their liberty. But the factions in the French councils hindered any relief from being fent to marshal Strozzi; for the queen, who had afterwards too much, had now fo very little power, that the could not fupport her relation. At length, after a fiege of eight months, Sienna was furrendered P. Montluc was confulted in the capitulation. by which the liberty of the city was preferved, under the protection of the emperor, and the garrifon was permitted to march out : neverthelefs, Montluc refused to fign the capitulation. The marquis de Marignan was furprised; but Montluc persifted in his resolution : adding, that the republic had made a good capitulation, and he was willing to afford them the benefit of it, by quitting their city; but that he and his garrifon would owe their fafety to their fwords, in cafe they fhould be attacked on their march. The marquis thought fo good a defence excufed this fingularity of fentiment, and fuffered Montluc to take his own way, who, at his return to France, received the king's order, which was then a great honour. and afterwards the ftaff of marshal of France 9. In Piedmont, the marshal de Brifac had meditated the relief of Sienna, with the finall army that he commanded; but there was a faction against him too, fo that the project he fent of this expedition to court was rejected. However, being at liberty in his government, he contrived and executed the furprize of Cafal, on Shrove Tuesday, when the officers of the imperial army were intent on the diversions that closed the carnival. Their general faved himfelf in the caftle, but he was obliged to capitulate in a few days. The duke of Alba was fent to command in his room : he took fome places by ftorm, where he put the Italian foldiers to the fword, and fent the French to the gallies; but, the duke of Aumale arriving with a confiderable reinforcement, he received feveral fevere checks, and the campaign ended, as it began, on this fide, to the advantage of the French.

In the mean time cardinal Pole fet on foot a new ne- New negociation for peace, to which the king feemed to liften gociations with great cordiality; but this, the French writers fairly for a peace own, was owing to his apprehension of feeing the English embarked, as they afterwards were, in the Spanish quarrel. The treaty, notwithstanding, came to nothing; for, though the coffers of both monarchs were exhaufted, yet neither had any real defire of making peace.- Henry refolved not to part with Metz, Toul, and Verdun, and vet he could not avow that refolution, for fear of provoking the princes and flates of the empire. He feemed, therefore, willing to part with them, but then he peremptorily demanded the duchy of Milan, which the emperor refufed, and, in as peremptory a manner demanded Burgundy; fo that Pole, feeing his good defigns defeated, fuffered the conferences to end, without teftifying any thing more than a deep concern for the obltinacy of both princes'. The campaign in the Low Countries fhewed that they were not more unwilling to make peace than unable to make war. The Imperialists intended to beliege Marienburgh, or at leaft to blockade it; but the French found means to relieve it; and therefore, as the laft effort of his military genius, Charles directed the conflructing two fortreffes for the fecurity of his dominions, which were Charlemont and Philipville'. On the other hand, the French were able to do nothing, not even to prevent William of Naffau, prince of Orange, from ravaging Picardy, after cutting a great part of the militia of the province to pieces. Thus ended the great operations of the year; but there happened befides feveral other events, of which it is abfolutely neceffary that we should take some notice, in order to preferve a perfpicuous connection between the past and fucceeding parts of this hiftory.

The emperor, Charles the Fifth, finding his faculties extremely exhausted, thought fit to refign his regal and hereditary dominions to his fon, which he did gradually, and with all the circumstances of deliberation and dignity, which were confpicuous in the great actions of his life. This was far from being a matter of indifference to France, and yet the king could not publicly take any fhare in it. His ministers in Germany, however, used all their skill to prevent Ferdinand king of the Romans from refigning that dignity in favour of Philip, in which their endeavours were attended with fuccefs. The death of Henry d'Albret king of Navarre was another interesting circumftance; for the king, either of his own motive, or prompted by fome of his ministers, had a strong inclination to take the poor remains of that kingdom from Anthony duke of Vendofme, who had married the heirefs, and to give him an equivalent in the heart of the kingdom. But Anthony, having either fome intelligence or fome fufpicion of it, made fuch hafte into the principality of Bearn, as fecured him peaceable poffeffion, in which the king did not think it afterwards expedient to trouble him'. But, as a mark of his refentment, he detached Languedoc from the duke's government of Guienne, and refused that of Picardy to his brother Lewis prince of Condé. On the death of pope Julius the Third fucceeded Marcellus the Second, a man of exemplary virtue and rational piety. Pontiffs of this character are feldom long-lived : he polfeffed this dignity twenty-five days, and was fucceeded in it by John Peter Caraffa, upwards of fourfcore, who took the name of Paul the Fourth, and, laying alide that great fhew of aufterity and fanctity of manners by which he feemed to have merited the pontificate, affumed at once not only the flate of a great prince, but of the prince of princes, which was the title he affected. He had two nephews, John and Charles: the former he made general of the forces of the church, and covered the head of the latter with a cardinal's hat. Pope Paul was fcarce warm in his feat, before he entered into a negociation with the king, for the recovery, as it was ftyled, but in effect for the partition, of the kingdom of Naples, which propofal was well received at court, through the interest of the princes of Lorrain, the cardinal afpiring to the popedom, and the duke of Guife having a vehement defire to be viceroy of Naples, having alfo, as heir to the houfe of Anjou, a fort of title to the kingdom itfelf ". The better part of the council were against this project ; but their oppolition was of little weight. The conftable, indeed, was

*If againft it, and might have oppofed it with effect, but he contented himfelf with hinting at the bad confequences that might attend it, being willing to be quit of one who had fo great a fhare as the duke of Guife evidently had in the king's favour. The cardinal of Lorrain, therefore, was fent to Rome, to put the laft hand to this treaty, and directed to carry with him the cardinal de Tournon, who was but juft returned from thence, who went, indeed, in obedience to the king's orders, but very plainly and honeftly declared how much he difliked the commifien, which did not hinder the treaty from being concluded in the month of December *, though, for reafons of flate-refpecting both parties, it was kept extremely feeret, in order to fereen the pope from the emperor's immediate refentment, and to give time for engaging other allies.

The absence of the cardinal of Lorrain, left the king's A truce beear more open to free council than it had been; and fome tween the deputies of his, having conferred with fome of the em- emperor peror's about the exchange of prisoners, the latter de- and the manded if they had no inftructions to agree to a truce; of which the court being informed, and cardinal Pole renewing his inftances at the fame time, the conftable took this opportunity of procuring fuch inftructions *. The pope, being acquainted with this circumstance, by the cardinal de Tournon, refined a little too far upon it; for, in confidence that neither the emperor nor his fon the king of Spain, would leave Piedmont, part of Tufcany, and Corfica, in the hands of France, together with her conquefts in the Low Countries, for any length of time, he diffembled his diflike of this proposition, and advifed the king to accept the truce, which was accordingly concluded in the beginning of the month of February, at the abbey of Vaucelles, near Cambray, the emperor being exceedingly defirous to leave his fon in peace r. The pope was greatly difpleafed, but not difconcerted by this transaction; he refolved immediately to fend a cardinal legate to each of the monarchs, to congratulate them on the conclusion of the truce, and to exhort them, out of pity to their fubjects, and charity to the reft of Chriftendom, to convert this truce into a folid and lafting peace. But the true intent of fending his nephew, cardinal Caraffa, to the court of France, was to prevail upon the king to break the truce, and to revive the war in Italy immediately. According to the course of nature he had not long to live, and he was defirous of feeing the houfe of Caraffa on a level with that of Medicis, or, at least, with that of Farnele. In the management of this negociation, cardinal Caraffa found fome difficulty, for the conftable exclaimed warmly against the breach of the truce, as equally inconfistent with the kingdom's interest and the king's honour 2.

It was carried, notwithstanding, by the influence of the It is broke duke of Guife, fupported by that of the queen, and, which was much more powerful, the folicitation of the duchefs of Valentinois. The queen was defirous to fee her coufin, marshal Strozzi, once more in command; and the duke of Aumale having married a daughter of the duchefs, that lady was entirely devoted to the houfe of Lorrain<sup>2</sup>. But the pope, to remove all obstacles, feized the king of Spain's minister, charging him with being privy to a confpiracy against his government, and even against his perfon, declared his mafter to have forfeited his right to the kingdom of Naples, and threatened both him and his father with exconimunication b. Upon thefe provocations, the duke of Alva had orders to enter the Ecclefiaffical State; and the pope, in confequence of thefe orders, exclaimed that the truce was broke, therefore he had a right to demand the fupport of France. The marshals Strozzi and Montluc were fent to Rome, with fome forces; marshal Brifac began hostilities in Piedmont, and the duke of Guife prepared to pass the mountains with a puiffant army c. At the very opening of the year, the duke of Guifeentered Italy with an army of twenty thousand men; and, by the king's command, conferred with marshal de Brifac, as to the conduct of the campaign. The marfhal obferved, that their mafter had two things in view, the relief of the pope, who was extremely preffed by the duke of Alva, and the recovery of the countries upon which he had a claim in Italy. Milan, as a meafure which would anfwer both ends, fince it would oblige the duke of Alva to retire out of the Ecclefiaftical State, and certainly put the king's forces in poffeffion of the best part of that duchy . The duke of Guife could not help approving of the fcheme; but as it did not agree with his inftructions, he defired that the marquis de Villars might be dispatched to court with the marshal's reasons, in order to receive the king's commands; but, before he propofed this advice, he had difpatched a courier to the cardinal his brother. The marquis, at his arrival, flated the marfhal's proposition to the council, where it was fo ftrenuoufly fupported by the conftable and the marfhal de St. Andre, that the king could not help applauding it. In the evening, however, the cardinal of Lorrain, the queen, and the duchefs, fo importuned the king, that they obtained express orders to the duke of Guife to march directly to Rome, and fent back his courier with them in the night. The marquis de Villars being informed of this particular, in the morning, went to the king booted and fpurred, defiring his difpatch, purfuant to the refolution taken in council, a circunitance which gave Henry infinite difquiet; but he made the best excuse he could, acknowleged the marshal de Brifac's capacity and zeal for his fervice, and fent him a finall fupply of money, which otherwife he would not have obtained f. When, in purfuance of these orders, the duke of Guife advanced into the papal territories, he was quickly convinced how ill he had taken his measures; and, after being deceived over and over by cardinal Caraffa, he was plainly told, that, the pope being unable to fulfil his treaty, he must act as well as he could. But, though pope Paul could not furnith troops to his ally, he was very defirous of affifting France by his intrigues. With this view, he fet on foot a negociation with the duke of Tulcany, for the marriage of his fon with Elizabeth, king Henry's eldeft daughter. Colmo de Medicis received this proposition with great respect and complaifance, on which it was published at Rome that the marriage was concluded. King Philip, who knew the confequence of this alliance, offered the duke the coffion of Sienna, and its territory, which was precifely what he defired, who thereupon, excufed himfelf as to the marriage, owning he was highly honoured in the propolition, which, however, it was unfit for fo little a prince to ac-

Thus the houfes of Medicis and Farnefe acquired by this war all they could defire, without being exposed either to danger or expense, while the duke of Guife found it abfolutely impossible to penetrate into the kingdom of Naples; and while things were in this fituation, he received the news of the total defeat of the French army at St. Quintin, with express orders to return without delay <sup>g</sup>. The pope was now left entirely at the mercy of king Philip, who treated him with fuch moderation in respect to his perfonal interests, with such deference in regard to his political capacity, and with fuch profound marks of respect for his digniry, by ordering the duke of Alva to go, in perfon, and make his fubmiffions to the pontiff, that he gained him entirely, infomuch that he told the duke of Guife, at his audience of leave, that in this expedition he had done little for the king, lefs for the interefts of the holy fee, and nothing for his own reputation<sup>b</sup>. The marshal de Brifac, on the fide of Piedmont, acted with the fame vigilance and vivacity in this as in former campaigns, and with like fuccefs; but as the king's jealoufy had fent him to this diftant command, fo his weaknefs and condefcention deprived France of all the advantages which, by his great courage and conduct, he had obtained.

of Picardy, and fearce any in the field, when, in the month of July, the king of Spain's army affembled, by the march of troops on all fides, at Givet, where, when Emanuel Philibert, duke of Savoy, came to take upon him the command, they confifted of thirteen thousand horfe, and fifty thousand foot. In his march the duke feemed refolved to befiege first Marienburgh, and afterwards Rocroi; but on a fudden, turning alide in the beginning of the month of August, he invested St. Quintin, which at this time was the ftrongest place on the frontier of Picardy, but, having a very weak garrifon, could not have made any great refiftance. Gafpar de Coligni, admiral of France and governor of Picardy, with feveral perfons of diffinction, forced a paffage into it, with five hundred horfe, and two hundred foot, where he difpofed every thing in the beft manner he could for an obflinate defence<sup>1</sup>. The conftable, his uncle, had by this time drawn together an army of twenty-five thousand men, with which he refolved to throw a confiderable body of infaatry into the place. It was with this view that, on the 10th of August, which is regarded by the Roman church as the feast of St. Laurence, he passed the river Somme; and, having furprifed the enemy, Dandelot, the admiral's brother, found means to get into the place with five hundred foot. It is agreed, by all hiltorians, that if the constable had made his retreat immediately, after the fuccours entered, and before the duke of Savoy had recovered his furprize, which had obliged him to quit his own quarter to retire to that of count Egmont, he might have done it with fafety; but he was fo flow in his motions. and count Egmont preffed fo hard upon his rear, that the perfons who had the care of the artillery and baggage begau to fly. This confusion was fo well improved by that count, that at length the duke of Savoy came up, and charged with his whole army; fo that in the space of half an hour the whole French army was routed, with the lofs of three thousand fix hundred killed, and at least as many taken, together with all the artillery, except two pieces of cannon, and the baggage entire m. But what was ftill more difastrous, as well as more difhonourable to the nation, was the number of great perfons flain and taken prisoners; amongst the former was the duke d'Anguien, the vifcount de Turenne, with upwards of fix hundred gentlemen of note; the conftable himfelf, the dukes of Montpenfier and Longueville, the marshal de St. André, with upwards of three hundred other perfons of diffinction were amongst the latter ".

The conftable is exceedingly blamed for attempting fuch a retreat against the express advice of the marshal de St. André, for not fending away the baggage and artillery in time, and for not pofting fome infantry with fire arms in his rear, who might have checked the enemy's cavalry, and faved the reft of the army. On the other hand, the duke of Savoy is as loudly blamed for not marching directly to Paris, which all agree he might have done; but a Spanish writer wifely asked, could he as eafily have come back? Adding, that his father perfuaded Charles the Fifth to his expedition into Provence, where, at their entrance, they eat pheafants, but fed upon roots, and were glad of them when they came back °. Be this as it will, the duke of Savoy thought the advantage that might accrue from ravaging the flat country was not equivalent to the reduction of St. Quintin, and fome other places on the frontier, from whence excursions might be made at pleafure; and king Philip acquiefcing in his reafons, the duke returned to his camp before the place, to which, foon after, the king reforted in perfon. The admiral Coligni p having in the mean time received fome fresh fuccours, laboured with incredible diligence to repair and ftrengthen the place; on the other hand, the enemy changed their manner of attack, and proceeded by mining, till at length, all things being prepared, they renewed their firing, and, by the effects of their batteries and mines, having made five breaches, they prepared for a general affault, which, though he had no hopes of fuccour, and very little of repelling, the admiral refolved to fustain. This he did with incredible valour, till, through the cowardice of one officer, the Spaniards entered the place, of which circumflance Quintin Coligni being informed, he went with a very few perfons of diftinction who were about him, to try whether any thing could be done, but was prefently furrounded and taken prifoner. The place was then forced on every fide, and the greatest part of the garrison put to the fword 9. Many have blamed the admiral for facrificing fo many brave men by his obftinacy; a very unjust reflection, confidering that the beft informed writers agree, that his obftinate defence faved France, and fairly own, that if but

The king went thither in perfon; the duke of Nevers, and the reft of the great officers who had efcaped from the battle, drew together the fcattered remains of the army, which was reinforced on all fides; fifty perfons of quality undertook to defend each of them a town, and the great cities of the kingdom vied with each other in fending fums of money to the king, without being fo much as alked; fo that Henry had reason to confess the truth of the latt words which his father pronounced, "Remember, fon, the French are the beft people in the world :" but, after all, it is very difficult to know what turn things would have taken, if it had not been for the interpolition of the Swifs; for, while the king, and all his minifters and generals were labouring to affemble fuch a force as might prevent the progrefs of the duke of Savoy, they were alarmed by an unexpected invafion, upon which, in all probability, the duke of Savoy depended for the plundering of Paris', after the reduction of St. Quintin. There was one Nicholas de Pollweiler, a gentleman of diftinction in Alface, who pretended to raife, upon his own credit, a body of troops to march into Hungary against the Furks; but when he had increased their numbers to about ten thoufand men, he fuddenly paffed the Rhine at Strafburgh, and, notwithstanding the neutrality established for Franche Compté, penetrated as far as Breffe, intending to proceed to Lyons, where he had fome intelli-This affair threw the kingdom into fuch a congence. thousand Swifs, which the king had raifed with the free gifts of his fubjects, he was in a condition to ftop the the duke of Savoy's progrefs. That he might do it the more effectually, Henry bestowed upon him the title of lieutenant-general of his armies within and without the king-A.D.1557. dom; and it was once proposed to have given him that of viceroy. Thus the miferies of France proved the fource of the glory of the house of Guise t. At the fame time that the king heaped these favours upon the duke, he did not forget his father's caution not to raife the boufe of Lorrain too high, though he acted directly contrary to it, for he affured the conftable that he acted merely from neceffity ; that he would never prejudice the authority of his office; that he retained the most fincere affection for his perfon, and would always pay the greatest refpect to his advice; and in this particular, as it afterwards appeared, the king meant to keep his word ".

The duke of Guife, on the other hand, ftudied to augment his reputation, that he might at all times preferve his power, which was already as great as could be enjoyed by a fubject : fortunately for him he difcovered that admiral Coligni, being governor of Picardy, had formed a defign of furprising Calais in the winter; had reduced the project to writing, and employed fome of the most experienced officers who ferved under him, to canvals every circumftance of it with the greateft care. The duke of Guife having read this paper, and examined the officers who had been trufted with the fecret, faw, that notwithstanding the great appearance of difficulty, there wanted in reality nothing but a little good conduct to make this enterprize fucceed; and, as things then flood, the conflable and admiral being both prifoners, he had all things in his own power. He began by ordering the privateers of Normandy and Bretagne to cruize in the channel, more especially in the very fireights of Calais; he then detached the duke of Nevers, with a confiderable army, towards the country of Luxemburgh; a motion which drew the attention of the Spaniards that way : when all things were ready, he procured an application from the people of Boulogne, for a body of troops to fecure them against the incursions of the Spaniards; he fent a ftrong detachment at their requeft, which was followed by another, under colour of fupporting them, then repaired thither in perfon, fecure that his officers would follow his inftructions; and thus, on the farft day of the new year, Calais was invefted. He immediately attacked fort St. Agatha, which the garrifon quitted, and retired into the fort of Nieulai, which, together with the Rifbank, the befiegers attacked at the fame time, granted good terms to the officer who commanded in the former, but obliged the garrifon of the latter to furrender prifoners of war ". By these means he opened a communication with the fea; and having received from on board the thips an immenfe quantity of hurdles, his infantry, by the help of them, paffed the moraffes that lie round the town. He then made a falle attack at the water-gate, which drew the attention of the garrifon, who fatigued themfelves exceedingly in making entrenchments behind the breach ; but when they had finished their work, he began to fire upon the caffle, where the walls were very old, and had been neglected on account of the breadth of the ditch, which was also very deep when the tide was in; but a great breach being made, the duke caufed it to be attacked in the night, and during the ebb, the foldiers palling almost up to the shoulders. The place was eafily carried, though the governor made three vigorous attacks before the break of day, in order to diflodge them; but the French, though they loft a confiderable number of men, kept their pofts ". The governor then faw that it was impracticable to defend the place any longer, and therefore made the best terms for himfelf that he could obtain, which, however, were not very good; and thus, in eight days, the duke of Guife recovered a fortrefs which coft the victorious Edward the Third a whole year's fiege. and which had been now two hundred and ten years in the poffeffion of the English, without fo much as a fingle attempt to retake it. There are very different accounts given of this matter. Some English historians fay, that king Philip penetrated the defign of the French upon this fortrefs, gave notice of it in England, and offered to take the defence of it upon himfelf; but that this, out of jealoufy, was refufed, it being believed to be only an artifice to get a place of fuch confequence into his own hands. The truth of the matter feems to be this; the ftrength of Calais confifted in its fituation and outworks, which reguired a very numerous garrifon ; but this being attended with a very large expence, the best part of the troops had been fent to join Philip's army, fo that the governor had not above five hundred men, and there were not more than two hundred and fifty of the townfmen able to bear arms. As to ammunition, artillery, and provisions, the French found there abundance, but with fo flender a garrifon, that it was impossible to make a better defence, and therefore, when the lord Wentworth, who was governor, and whom the French call lord Dumfort, was tried by his peers for the lofs of this place, he was acquitted *. The caftle of Guifnes furrendered alfo, after a thort, but very fharp fiege, and the garrifon in that of Hames, though the fituation rendered it impregnable, abandoned it; io that, by the end of January, the English had nothing left of what for fo long a time they had y poffetfed in France. The duke of Guife obliged all the English inhabitants to quit Calais, and bestowed the government of it upon des Termes, who was foon after made a marshal of France 2, in confideration of his eminent fervices in Scotland and Italy.

The king, mean while held the ftates, as is generally faid, or, as others ftyle them, an affembly of the notables at Paris, in which the parliament entered as a diffinct body, and took place between the nobles and the people. The king demanded from this affembly three millions of livres, which were very chearfully granted *. The flates fat but a week, and, as foon as they feparated, the king went with the dauphin to visit the frontiers, and made a kind of triumphant entry into Calais. The houfe, or, as it began to be now flyled, the faction of Lorrain, was predominant; and, to fecure their authority, as well as in fome measure to perpetuate it, they prefied the marriage of the dauphin with queen Mary of Scotland, which was accordingly celebrated on the 24th of April<sup>b</sup>; but the Scotch ambaffadors, who were fent over by the flates to allift at the folemnity, having refused to acknowlege the dauphin for their fovereign, are faid to have paid dear for it, four of them dying with ftrong fulpicions of poifon, which threw a fhade on that marriage, and verified the conftable's prediction, that it would be fatal to both nations. But the cardinal of Lorrain and the duke of Guife, who were uncles to the queen, fortified their intereft by it for the prefent. They procured, not long after, the king's permission for the duchess-dowager of Lorrain to visit her fon at Peronne; the brought with her the famous Granvelle, bishop of Arras, and the cardinal of Lorrain conducted thither the young prince. What the avowed motive of this interview might be, does not very clearly appear; but it is commonly and with great probability, fuppofed to have been the fource of all the fublequent mileries of France . Granvelle informed the cardinal that Dandelot. the admiral's brother, and the conftable's nephew, was a zealous Protestant. The cardinal communicated this intelligence to the king at his return, who did not believe it. He queflioned him, however, about it publicly, as he attended him at dinner, and afked particularly what he thought of the facrifice of the mafs? He answered firmly, that he thought it an impicty. The king, going to throw a plate at him, hurt the dauphin who ftepped in between them, and immediately fent Dandelot prifoner to the caftle of Mclund. The pope, when he heard of it, was very angry that the king did not caufe him to be burnt. The king deprived him of his great office of colonel-general of the infantry, notwithstanding the great fervices he had performed, and bestowed it upon Montluc, who was attached to the duke of Guife . He attended that prince at the fiege of Thionville, which, though a very ftrong place, was taken in feventeen days; but it coft the life of marshal Strozzi, whose batoon was given to monfieur des Termes<sup>f</sup>. Orders were fent to that officer to march with a fmall body of troops into the enemy's country, with an affurance that he fhould be fupported by the duke of Guife. Monfieur des Termes executed this command with all poffible fpirit and fuccefs; he took Dunkirk and Bergue Saint Winok, and penetrated as far as Nieuport. Hearing nothing of the duke of Guife, he was obliged to retreat, followed by count Egmont, with a fuperior army, who forced him to a battle on the fands near Graveline, on the 1 th of July, where, being exposed to the fire of ten English men of war, his troops were soon broke, about a third killed, another third taken prifoners, with himfelf and many perfons of diffinction <sup>g</sup>. As for the reft, they were most of them knocked on the head by the peafants. The duke of Guife came in fo good time with his army to cover the frontiers, that it highly raifed his glory with the populace, though there wanted not those who fuspected that marshal de Termes with his forces had been facrificed with this view. The princes of the house of Lorrain quarrel with the duchess of Valentinois.

In Italy the French affairs declined extremely, Althe importunities of marfhal Brifac, to obtain furplies, were fruitlefs; and the cardinal of Lorrain, to jultity his own conduct in this manner, reported that Dillac had raifed a fortune to himfelf, by diverting the public money to his own ufe. The duchefs of Valentinois upon this charge abandoned the marthal, for whom the had thewn fo much effeem : and it was not without fome dificulty that he obtained leave to come to court in order to vindicate himfelf, which he did fo effectually, that he not only recovered his credit with the king, but grew alfo into his favour, a circumftance which did not contribute to make his circumftances eafier in Piedmont, fince those who hated him for his abilities were now Lecome jealous of him as their rival h. For thefe reafons it was never put in his power to avail himfelf of the diversions made by the Furkish flect on the coafts of Naples and Sicily, which were afterwards victualled in Provence; fo that they rendered the French exceedingly odious throughout Chriftendom, without doing them any fervice. At the clofe of the fummer, Henry and Philip put themfelves at the head of their refpective armies, which were encamped very near each other, as if they intended to decide all their quarrels by a battle : but, on a fudden, things changed their face ; for the princes of the house of Lorrain having taken the liberty to doubt whether a woman of feventy could pique herfelf on beauty without being ridiculous, the duchefs of Valentinois, in her turn, took the freedom of laving before the king the miferies of his fubjects, and advifed him to make use of the conftable to fet on foot a negociation for peace1. Philip gave that nobleman leave to go to the king's camp, where he was received by his mafter with all poffible marks of efteem and tendernefs. Yet a fhort truce was all that followed, Philip infifting peremptorily upon the reftitution of Calais, as Henry did that Navarre fhould be reftored to its fovereign : in the mean time Charles V. died, and Mary of England, events which rendered Philip lefs politive, and made way for the conferences of Chateau

Cambrefis, where the English and Spanish plenipotentiaries differing, they treated apart k. At length each concluded a feparate peace, notwithstanding the dauphin, by the king's command, had affumed the arms of England, as if upon the death of queen Mary he had acquired a title to that crown, in right of his confort the queen of Scots; a circumstance useles to France, and fatal to her.

The princes of the houfe of Lorrain, fenfible that their Confefavour was rather on the decline, preffed the marriage quences of which had been promifed between the duke, chief of their the paace, houfe, and the king's fecond daughter the princefs Claude, riages in which wasaccordingly celebrated in the month of February 1, the royal while the negociations for peace were yet depending. The family, and duke of Guife and his brother, according to the maxims of unfortutheir policy, affected to blame a treaty which was fo visibly of the kine; difadvantageous to France, fince for Hames, Catalet, and St. Quintin, they rendered one hundred and ninety-eight fortified places to their enemies: but the conftable had perfuaded the king, that, in order to become truly puiffant, he did not ftand in need of any accellion of territory, but of a kingdom, where the people lived more at eafe, had their lands better cultivated, and were addicted to induftry and traffick. At the fame time that he introduced thefe new maxims, he prevailed upon the king to difcard two old ones, which he convinced him had been the one ruinous, and the other fcandalous to his predeceffor ; and fo long as they continued to influence his councils, could not fail of producing the fame effects: the first was the claim of the houfeof Orleans in Italy, which ferved only to exhauft the wealth and the force of the nation, and to exalt a number of new families in Italy to the rank and degree of princes; the other was the clofe alliance with the Turks, which had indeed made the French formidable, but had, however, made them hated by all the princes in Europe. These maxims once discarded, the quitting the places that were fill in their hands in Italy was a thing natural, and, in fome meafure political, which ought to have qualified the feeming inequality of the places rendered by the king, in comparison of those given up to France by the peace. But the true equivalent for all these places was the preferving Calais and its dependencies, and the three imperial cities of Metz, Toul, and Verdun, which were

of infinitely more confequence to France than all that fhe relinquished, more especially when it is confidered, that, by reftoring his territories, the king had in view alfo the gaining the duke of Savoy, who was to marry the king's fifter. At the beginning of June, that prince came with the duke of Alba and the prince of Orange, and a train of one hundred perfons of quality, to receive the princefs Elizabeth for king Philip, and the princefs Margaret for himfelf. The first of these marriages being over ", the king held a tournament, in which he himfelf, with the duke of Guife, the duke of Nemours, and the prince of Ferrara, were defendants; the first day he acquitted himfelf with great applaufe, as he likewife did on the fecond, which was the 30th of June; but in the evening he would break a lance with the count de Montgomery, the fon of monfieur de Lorges, captain of his guards, who was efteemed one of the ftrongeft, as well as one of the ableft knights in France; the count did all he could to avoid it, and the queen preffed the king not to enter the lifts again ; but he perfifted in his first intention, and in this encounter Montgomery broke his lance in fhivers up to his hand. one of the fplinters of which (the king infifting that they fhould tilt with their vizors up) flew with great violence into his right eye, fo that reeling from his horfe, he was caught by the dauphin and fome other perfons of quality". Some fay that he loft all fenfe, and the power of fpeech. and that he never recovered either ; others affirm that he forgave the count of Montgomery, and forbid his being queftioned. His furgeons, on taking off the first dreffing, had very little hopes of his recovery ; the duke of Savoy, who forefaw the difficulties that would attend the reftitution of his dominions, in cafe his marriage fhould be deferred till the king's death, caufed it to be reprefented to him, and it was thereupon celebrated on the 9th of July °, fome fay, in the king's chamber, others, in the church of Notre Dame : on the toth the king died, in the fortyfecond year of his age P, and in the thirteenth of his reign, exceedingly regretted by his fubjects; for, with many faults, he had most of the qualities that endear a monarch in France; he was brave, liberal, and polite; and though not learned himfelf, yet had a great affection and efteem for learned men, more efpecially for poets. (H) This king, to whom the French writers have given the furname of Belliqueux, or Warlike, was indeed of a martial disposition, and fortunate enough in fome of his expeditions. He was magnificent in his court, rather than in his buildings; he was not very nice in his drefs, though it has been remaiked, as an evidence of his finery, that he wore filk flockings. He had fome unclure of learning, and was a patron to men of letters, more efpecially poets. He is blamed for fuffering his court to tink into every kind of vice and luxury, under the specious titles of gallantry and politenels. He efpouted Catherine de Medicis, d ughter of Laurence, duke of Florence, born at Florence, April 13th, 1519, who, at the time of her marriage, was but fourteen. Having excellent parts, and a good education, fhe made it her principal fludy to fultain her perfonal charms by the affability of her behaviour. Yet the never made any great impression on the king's heart, nor had much thare in the management of affairs during his reign, at which, though the was exceedingly chagrined, yet the knew how to diffemble it, and fpent her time chiefly in the education of her children, whole tempers flie diligently fludied, and acquired over them an afcendancy which the preferved to

The queen always called him her fils egeré, that is, her wrong-headed fon : and Henry never mentioned him by any other title than ce feelerat, that willdin, and charged the king of Navaire, who was afterwards his fuccefior, to put him to death, a tafk which was not in that monurch's nature to perform. Acceffion of Francis II. and the fettlement of the administration in the Guifes.

A T the accellion of Francis the Second, he was not quite fixteen years of age, weak in his conflitution, and no way remarkable for the vigour of his capacity  $\cdot$ . His wife, Mary queen of Scots, was alfo very young, but had infinitely better parts, which had been cultivated with great care by her mother and by her uncles  $\bullet$ . In the eye of the law the king, however young or infirm, was of age, and at liberty to chufe his own council, thofe who in name were to govern under him; but who, in reality, were to govern both him and his kingdom. It was the ambition of enjoying this power, that excited thofe intrigues which gradually occafioned troubles that were of near feventy years continuance c (A). The princes king of Navarre. Victoria and Joanna, twins, who died in their infancy. Befides thefe, the king had feveral natural children. By a Scotch lady, whofe name was Fleming, he had Henry d'Angoulesme, grand prior of France, and governor of Frovence. By Philippa, a native of Piedmont, he had Diana d'Angoulefme, who first espoused Horatio Farnese, and afterwards Francis de Montmorency. By madame de Sevigné he had Henry de Remy. By the duchels of Valentinois he had no children. The manner of this monarch's death was fo extraordinary, that an opinion very ftrongly prevailed of its being foretold by Luke Gauric, a famous aftrologer. As this fallacious art was the grand foible of that age, even the most judicious of the French historians has given into this tale, and report that Catherine de Medicis having caufed the king's horofcope to be judged by the aftrologer before mentioned, he predicted that the king would be killed in a duel by a wound received in his eye, for which he was extremely derided, till the king's misfortune verified his prediction (1). His body was interred with his ancestors at St. Denis, the constable de Montmorency having this charge left to him by those who excluded him from any fhare in affairs of state.

the Fifth, king of Scotland, whofe dowager fhe then was, regent of that kingdom, and mother to the reigning queen of France. Louifa married Charles de Croy, prince of Chimay. The duke Francis was, in the opinion of all the writers of those times, one of the most accomplished men in France, gentle, modeft, affable, liberal, an excellent officer, and a finished courtiet. Ambition was his only vice, and it is imagined, that, if it had not been for his brother, he would have kept this within bounds. Charles, cardinal of Lorrain, archbishop of Rheims, was a man of great natural parts, affifted by an excellent education, and an indefatigabie fpirit : he fpoke eloquently, and wrote admirably : but his ambition was yet more boundlefs than his capacity; he was haughty and enterprizing in profperity; and had but a finall fhare of that fortitude which his brother poffeffed in a fupreme degree. He was no enemy to reformation, if it might have been effected in his own way; and it was fufpected would have brought in, the confession of Augsburgh, in order to govern, with the title of primate, the church of France. hering closely to each other. The princes of the blood were all of the house of Bourbon. The head of it, Anthony, king of Navarre, was a mild goodnatured honeft man, indolent, and much given to women. His brother Lewis, prince of Condé, did not refemble him in the least, except in his paffion for women. He was a little man, and had nothing ftriking, either in his perfon or manners : his fortune was very narrow, not above fix thoufand livres a year; but he was brave, active, enterprizing, eloquent, and equally firm in council and in action. The duke of Montpenfier was a gallant man, but a zealous papift, and ftrongly attached to the court. His brother. the prince of Roche Guion, followed his example, and never changed fides. The constable Anne de Montmorency, was very juilly reputed the wifeft man in France. He remained firm in the old religion, through the perfuafions of his wife, who continually put him in mind that he was the first Christian baron. He had five fons, of whom Francis the eldeft was marshal of France; Henry, who took the name of Damville, was marshal likewife, and afterwards conftable. His other fons were likewife powerful. Gasper de Coligni, admiral of France, was nephew to the conftable, and the great rival of the duke of Guife. He was a zealous protefiant; one Ff

duct of affairs, were excluded through jealoufy of their great power, as if they were like to be lefs dangerous when offended, than when employed. The constable. his children, and nephews, who, from their credit in the last reign, constituted of themselves a party, met with the fame treatment, the king declaring that he meant to confide the management of his affairs to the Guifes, the duke having the direction of whatever regarded military affairs, and his brother the cardinal of Lorrain having the management of the finances, and the domeftic œconomy. Though this difpolition agreed with, it was not fo much the effect of the king's choice, as a project formed by the two queens. The dowager was perfuaded, if the princes were admitted into a fhare, they would foon poffels themfelves of the whole administration; and, looking upon it as their right, pay her nothing more than exterior refpect ; and as for the constable, she hated him and his whole family. On the other hand, the Guifes fought her friendship, and being the uncles of the young queen, could not be eafily difgraced. Befides, fhe wanted fupport, and . therefore the infifted only on one condition, namely, their abandoning the duchefs of Valentinois to her refentment. to his noble feat at Chantilly: his office of mafter of the houfhold was taken from him, and given to the duke of Guife ; but, to make him fome fmall amends, his eldeft fon was declared marshal of France. The prince of Condé was fent into Flanders, with a ratification of the late peace, and the collar of the king's order to the king of Spain ". In his absence the government of Picardy, which had been intended for him by the late king, was beflowed on the marshal Brifac, who, chagrined at the ill ulage of his old friend, was amazed, but at the fame time cbliged by this act of justice, in those from whom he had never expected any. The feals being taken from Bertrandi, now become a cardinal, were reftored to the chancellor Olivier, a ftep which raifed the reputation of the new. ministry; and fome other promotions were made with the like view f. The conftable, as foon as the late king was wounded, had written to Anthony, king of Navarre, first prince of the blood, to prefs his coming to court. In purfuance of this advice, he was come as far as Vendofme, where he was met by the admiral Coligni, his two brothers Dandelot and the cardinal de Chatillon, with feveral other perfons of great diftinction, and at length joined by the prince of Condé, on his return from Flanders. There they deliberated on the ftate of affairs, and the ill ufage they had met with ; the prince Dandelot and fome others were for having recourfe to arms, under pretence that the king was in the hands of ftrangers ; but his brother the king of Navarre, and the majority of that affembly, declared for milder measures F. The king therefore was fent to court, where he was cajoled by the queen-mother, and but indifferently treated by the minifters, who fhewed fo little refpect to his dignity, as a king and first prince of the blood, that, when he came to St. Germain en Laye, he might have remained in the ftreets, if the marshal de St. André, out of pure politeness, had not offered him his apartments in the caftle h. However, he and the prince of Condé both affifted at the king's coronation on the 18th of September, at Rheims, which was performed by the cardinal of Lorrain, archbishop of that fee i. After this ceremony, the king of Navarre was invited to council, where a letter was read from the king of Spain, importing, that he had intelligence of fome difcontents in the kingdom, and offering whatever affiftance could be defired for the fupport of the young king's authority. The queen-mother, perceiving that this wrought upon the king of Navarre, defired that he would conduct her daughter, the princefs Elizabeth, to the frontiers of Spain; a charge which would afford him an opportunity of entering into a negotiation for the recovery of his dominions. in which the promifed him all the affiftance in her power k. Popular edicts ; the erecting of the Cham-Gres Ardentes ; the execution of the count de Bourg.

The court feemed now fo well fettled, that they had nothing to fear; which confideration, however, did not hinder them from concerting and carrying into execution every measure poffible for their fecurity; but, though this was the real view, they took care to conceal it, and to frame the edicts published in the king's name in fuch a manner, that they appeared to be calculated folely for the public good. They forbad the carrying of fire arms, or wearing fuch dreffes as might conceal them, to prevent mischief and murder in the streets. They refumed lands alienated from the royal domain; they obliged all who had two or more places, to make choice of one, and to guit the reft. By these methods they provided for their own fecurity, and for their own creatures. They likewife . made a promotion of eighteen knights of the order at once, which, though it gratified many, exposed that honour, to which the first subjects had hitherto eagerly afpired, to a degree of contempt, from which it never recovered 1. But when, by these other arts, they had thoroughly established themselves, and procured a general fubmission, they began to discover another kind of spirit, which at once augmented the number of their enemies, and furnished with matter of complaint multitudes, efpecially of military perfons out of employment, most of which repaired to court, fome to folicit their arrears, and others to obtain relief. The cardinal of Lorrain, vexed with their applications, and not knowing how to content them, published an edict, by which they were commanded to retire in a very fhort space, on pain of being hang-A.D. 1539. ed without process. by an edict, add a chamber to each of the parliaments in the kingdom for the profecution of heretics; and from the fury with which they proceeded, and the panifhment to which they condemned those who were convicted before them, they were ftyled Chambres Ardentes, that is, Burning Chambers ... At Paris, the prefident Minard, who was remarkably violent, being killed in the ftreets, this murder was revenged upon Anne du Bourg, nephew to the chancellor of the fame name, counfellor of the parliament of Paris, a man of invincible firmnefs and incorruptible probity, who had been condemned in the late reign for his religion, and was now hanged and burnt on the 10th of December, at the common place of execution, where he behaved with an intrepidity " worthy of his own reputation, and of the caufe of truth in which he fuffered.

The more confiderate Catholics, amongft whom were fome prelates and many of the clergy, difapproved this furious conduct, and teftified an inclination to conciliate mens minds by a just and reasonable reformation, under legal authority; the fcandalous ignorance, and more fcandalous vices of most of those ecclefiallics who drove on these furious measures, difcrediting their caufe, much more than the authority of the court could advance it. The admiral and his brothers were avowed Protestants; the king of Navarre, and his brother the prince of Condé, were inclined to the reformed religion. In the first general affembly held at Nantes, at which were prefent one hundred and fifty deputies from the reformed in all the different provinces, it was refolved to take the only measure left for their own defence, that of putting themfelves in arms, with which view the prince of Condé was chosen chef muet, that is, the filent or concealed chief, and John du Barri, feigneur de la Renaudie, chef visible, or the acting and avouved head of the Protestants". folution ; but is reported to have been guilty of fome irregularities in his youth, which might have been fatal to him, but for the favour of the duke of Guife. Subordinate chiefs were likewife chofen to direct the intended armament in different provinces. Renaudie was fent over to England to folicit the countenance and pecuniary affiftance of queen Elizabeth, in which folicitation his views were farthered by the imprudent conduct, or rather by the exorbitant ambition of the houfe of Guife, who, not content with the abfolute direction of the two kingdoms of Frauce and Scotland, afpiring to the like dominion over England, kept up the claim of their niece to that crown, and endeavoured to suppress the reformed in Scotland; fo that Elizabeth, for her own fecurity, refolved to affift both the Scotch and the French malcontents P. 'The reformed in this kingdom, being once apprized of her fentiments, and those of the German princes in another affembly, refeived to furprife the court at Blois, to fecure the perions of the king and of the Guifes, or rather to rid themfelves of the latter, to oblige the king to declare the prince of Condé lieutenant-general of the realm, and, in fhort, to change the whole face of affairs 9. They fixed the 15th of March for this enterprize, for the execution of which, their forces were to defile, with all poffible fecrecy, in fmall numbers, under chiefs already appointed from every quarter. It was conducted with fuch profound fecrecy, that the court had not the leaft intelligence of it, till Renaudie, having communicated the whole of it to Peter Annelles, an advocate of Paris, with whom he lodged, this man, either through fear or from fome other motive, gave intelligence of it to the court '. where at first the thing appeared fo amazing, that it was fcarce credited; but upon clofer enquiry it was thought requifite to lofe no time in providing for the king's fecurity and their own; for this purpole, the duke of Guife was confirmed in his post of lieutenant-general of the kingdom, and the court removed from the caffle of Ambolfe. Of this removal the confpirators were apprized s; but, finding themfelves fo far advanced, refolved to proceed, more especially as the prince of Condé was actually with the king, and there were also many other perfons about the court, of whofe good intentions towards them they had, or perfuaded themfelves they had, reason to be affured. Thus both fides feemed to agree to put the king to a trial, in a manner that must of necessity throw the whole realm into convultions.

It was forefeen by the duke of Guife, that refpect to Con/piracy the king's name and the influence of his own authority, of Amboife the king's name and the influence of his own authority, defeated ; would enable him to affemble troops enough to difappoint crudites those who were embarked in this attack ; and, by his thereupon, great refolution, joined to his indefatigable diligence, and and narhis superior skill in military affairs, it ended as he ima- row escape gined it would. The count de Sancerre defeated the of the troops from Bearn, the duke de Nemours furprized the prince of baron de Castelneau; and made him prisoner, with the greateft part of his officers ; Pardaillan fell upon Renaudie in a wood; defeated the troops that ftill remained with him, and, in a perfonal engagement, ran him twice through the body; his page alfo fhot him with a harquebufs, notwithstanding which that desperate man killed the page. His body was exposed upon a gibbet, and afterwards quartered; three of the chiefs who furrendered were tortured and put to death in the prefence of the queendowager and of all the ladies of her court. One of them, whofe name was Villemonge, having first washed his hands in the blood of one of his companions, held them up to Heaven, and cried out, " Lord, revenge our caufe." Upwards of twelve hundred were beheaded, hanged, or drowned in the river; the ftreets of Amboile literally fwam with blood. The good old chancellor Olivier, after having laboured all he could to recommend milder meafures, died of regret and borror, at fight of cruelties which it was not in his power to prevent '. La Bigne, fecretary to la Renaudie, was grievoufly tortured, in order to oblige him to accuse the prince of Condé, who was confined; but all that could be drawn from him was, that he had heard it reported that the prince favoured their enterprize. The prince being admitted to fpeak for himfelf before the council, made his detence with great intrepidity and eloquence, clofing his speech with observing, that, as there were only fufpicions and infinuations against him, he could only offer to maintain his innocence with his fword, against any who should question it. The duke of Guife, obferving the impression which his difcourfe had made on all the affembly, rofe up, and profeffing a belief of what the prince had faid, offered to be his fecond". This declaration was only the effect of a refolution raken to diffemble what they knew, in order to prevent the prince from putting himfelf immediately and openly at the head of the protettants, in cafe they fpared his life, or of provoking the king of Navarre, with the conftable, the admiral, and his brothers, to take the like ftep, if they put the prince of Condé to death. He very well underflood their meaning; fo that, notwithflanding the feigned reconciliation which followed upon the compliment paid him by the duke of Guife, he was no fooner at liberty than he retired into Bearn to his brother ".

It required no great penetration to forefee that what had passed might, instead of appealing, excite fresh troubles ; and therefore art was to atchieve what had been begun by force : a relation of what had paffed at Amboife was transmitted to the constable, with the king's express orders to communicate it to the parliament of Paris, which he did, with great compliments to the duke of Guife; but he took the liberty of dropping the most material part of the relation, which was, that the confpiracy reached the king's perfon, becaufe he knew it was not true. The parliament complimented the court, and particularly the duke of Guife, to whom they gave the founding title of Preferver of his Country *. Pieces of the fame kind were transmitted to all parts of the kingdom, and the king wrote particularly to the two princes in Navarre, and to admiral Coligni in Normandy, to difpel any infurrections, and to keep things quiet. The queen-mother wrote to the latter, preffing him exceedingly to perform what the king expected, and to give her his advice on the prefent ftate of affairs, which he offered with great freedom. He told her, that, to reftore the public tranquillity, two things were necessary; to remove the house of Guise, and to allow liberty of confcience ; after which fteps, if fhe affumed the government entirely into her own hands, her prudence would teach her to preferve the peace which the had reftored y. Catherine faw it was impossible to take this advice, as things then flood; but, however, fhe did not diflike it. Michael de l'Hofpital, the fon of the con-Rable de Bourbon's phyfician, was raifed by her favour to the high post of chancellor of France; he put the feal to the famous edict of Romertin, by which the decision and declaration of herefy was left to the bifhops, and power given to the fubaltern judges to punifh without appeal *. It was chiefly by his advice the refolution was taken to affemble the princes, the great lords, prelates, and ministers, which is, what the French call, Affemblée des Notables, in the month of August, at Fontainbleauª. In the mean time a treaty was made with queen Elizabeth, by which their majefties guitted all pretentions to England. and abandoned their attempt to fupprefs the reformed religion in Scotland, where the death of the queen-mother had fallen out very unfeafonably for their fchemes; for fhe was a prince's of great moderation, and, though ftrongly attached to the old religion, very willing to take any measures, or to make any concessions that were requifite to preferve her daughter's authority b.

Upon the departure of the court for Fontainbleau, the Allemblee Guifes, under colour of providing for the king's fafety, des Notareally with a view to their own, affigned him a new guard of two hundred mulquetaires, commanded by Anthony du Pleffis Richlieu, who had many bad, and but few good qualities, exclusive of determined courage. The affembly the flates was opened on the 21ft, when the conftable with his fons, fummoned. and the admiral with his brothers, appeared. The king was feated on his throne, with the two queens, and the princes, his brothers, by him, and the bulinefs of the affembly was opened by the duke of Guife and the cardinal of Lorrain c. At the fecond feffions, the admiral prefented to the king a petition in favour of the Protestants, who about this time began to be ftyled Hugonots. This was warmly oppofed by the duke and the cardinal, but it was boldly feconded by Montluc, bithop of Valens, and Charles de Marillot, archbishop of Vienne, who inveighed bitterly against the general want of learning and of morals amongft the clergy; preffed a national council for regulating the difputes in religion; alleging, that fince the flame appeared in all parts of the kingdom, it would be weakness to fend for water from the Tiber to put it out, when the Seine was fo near at hand. At length it was agreed that a general affembly of the flates fhould be called in the beginning of the year, and that the profecution of the Protestants should be stayed in the mean time d. was, in hopes of drawing all the chiefs of the malccontents into the fame place, and confequently of furprizing them at once. It was with this view that they laboured affiduoufly, though with all poffible fecrecy, to ftrengthen their own hands, and inftead of Meaux, which had been the place first names, declared, in the king's name, that the flates fhould be held at Orleans. Some attempts were in this interval made by the adherents of the prince of Condé, to furprize Lyons, in which they were difappointed, by the king of Navarre's fending a countermand as foon as he was acquainted with it, for which the French blame his irrefolution ; whereas the truth feems to be, that he had no intent to rebel.

While the nation was in this fulpence, and those who had the welfare of France at heart, conceived great hopes that measures would be effectually taken in the flates for procuring fuch a reform of abufes of all kinds, as might qualify that violent fermentation, which religious and factious difputes had occasioned, the Guifes pursued inflexibly their own plan. Having disposed every thing in the death. beit manner poffible to keep the provinces in fome degree of order, they brought the young king to Orleans, with his new guards, and drew, under a variety of pretences, confiderable forces into the neighbourhood, and by degrees into the city. In the beginning of October, the king wrote to the king of Navarre, in very precife terms, to repair to the affembly, and to bring with him his brother the prince of Condé, to which appearance, however, neither of them were much inclined e. The marshal de St. André was therefore fent to invite them, charged to give them the ftrongeft affurances, and to pledge the king's royal word for their fafety. The cardinal de Bourbon, an honeft innocent man, was also prevailed upon to join his intreaties, and, as the memoirs of those times fay, the miftreffes of the king and prince were engaged by prefents to join their endeavours, which at length had their effect, notwithstanding all possible pains were taken, by the true friends of the houfe of Navarre, to fhew the king the danger into which he was on the point of plunging himfelf and his brother in their paffage f. They were met by the princefs of Condé, who laboured to diffuade her hufband from going farther; and the principal lords and gentlemen of the Hugonot party ufed their last efforts to engage the king of Navarre to put himfelf at their head, offering to furnish him in a short time with twenty thoufand men. The princes neverthelefs proceeded, but were fearce within the walls of Orleans, before they found just reason to repent trufting to the promises that had been made them 8. The prince of Condé, after having been very rudely used by the king, was fent to prifon, and guards were fet upon the king of Navarre . Commiffioners were named without delay for the trial of the prince; these were, the president Christopher de Thou, Bartholomew Fayes, and James Viole, counfellors of parliament. Gilbert Bourdin, and the attorney-general, and John du Tillet, fecretary to the parliament, affifted in their refpective offices. The prince appealed to the king in his parliament of Paris, affifted by the peers, as his proper judges;"the council declared this appeal void; the commiffioners proceeded, and fentenced the prince of Condé to fuffer death i. Mr. de Thou tells us, this fentence was not figned; but other writers affure us that it was, by all the privy council and knights of orders; only the chancellor and one of the counfellors of parliament defired time, and the count de Sancerre, when it was propofed to him, answered roundly, I shall not sign at all. The next point was to involve the king of Navarre. As they had no evidence, the great hiftorian beforementioned reports, that a scheme was laid by marshal St. André, that the king fhould fend for him, reproach him roughly with being a traitor, and, upon his answering with vchemence, as it was likely he would, certain affaffins posted near him for that purpofe, on a fign given, fhould plunge their daggers in his breaft k. He was accordingly invited to this fatal interview, in which, though he answered with great spirit, yet it was with fo much decency, and with fuch ftrong demonstrations of innocence, that, without making the appointed fign, he was difmified. Guife was fo provoked at his being allowed to retire, that he was heard to fay, in the corner of the room, what a weak and cowardly prince 1.

ing to hunt, that he might avoid the fight of an execution, a diverfity of which were the fole diffinctions of his unhappy reign, fainted while they were combing his hair; and when he came to himfelf, complained of an intolerable pain of the head. He had a fiftula in one of his ears, which his phylicians had confidered as the fymptom of an abfcefs; and, therefore, they quickly pronounced him in the utmost danger, a prognostic which gave a new turn to affairs m. The duke of Guile, and the cardinal of Lorrain, very earneftly preffed the queen-mother to put the king of Navarre, as well as the prince of Condé, to death ; but the answered irrefolutely, and with tears. At length, being importuned for a politive answer, the demanded a few hours to confider of it, in which space the confulted her oracle the chancellor, who, laying hold of this opportunity, fet the thing in a true light. He told her, that though the was a queen and the mother of kings, the was at the fame time a woman and a ftranger; that to put the king of Navarre to death without a trial, would be to render herfelf the execration of France, and at the fame time make fuch a precedent, as, from the moment it was made, the would have the greatest reason to fear. He obferved that even this ftep was not more dangerous than to behead the prince of Condé, and leave the king of Nawarre alive, who, the moment the king expired, must be fet at liberty, and who would then have, not only the Calvinists, but all the nobility of France, ready to espouse his interest and his resentment. Whereas, if the took the contrary courfe, the Guifes, having no fupport but her favour, must receive her commands with fubmifion, at the fame time that the princes would adhere to her from gratitude : that the fafety of the monarchy depended on a reconciliation of thefe jarring interefts, and, that gaining this abfolute afcendancy, would put that reconciliation in her power". The queen, who faw the rectitude of this advice, purfued it with fteadinefs and dignity. She fent for the king of Navarre, and after affirming that the had his life, as much as his brother's, in her power, the prefcribed the terms upon which they might both be faved, which confifted in his refignation of the regency in her favour, upon the enfuing minority, and a reconciliation with the Guifes. The king came readily enough into the first, but shewed great reluctance as to the second; at length, however, he was forced to comply. This reconciliation was made in the chamber of the dying king, who, to facilitate it, took all upon himfelf, profelling, that whatever had been done was by his orders, and without any infligation of the Guifes, who, he affirmed, were conftantly interceding for the princes °. This was the last action of this poor prince, who expired on the 5th of December, when he wanted fomewhat lefs than two months of eighteen years, after a reign of a year and five months P. He was ftyled the king without vice, which, as Mezeray well observes, would have been a high character, if it had proceeded lefs from a want of capacity, than from a want of inclination. At the death of the king his father, the care of his body and his funeral had been left to the conftable, the queen-mother and the Guifes having other things to mind; but the body of this young prince was fo totally abandoned, that if his governors, the fieurs de la Broffe and de Sanfac, had not interpofed, there would have been no care taken of it at all. This extreme ingratitude in the Guifes provoked fomebody to throw a note upon his coffin, in which were thefe words, Where then is Tannegui du Chastel? But he was a Frenchman! alluding to that brave man, who, at the hazard of his life and the expence of his fortune, caufed the corpfe of Charles the Eighth to be magnificently interred, though he knew it would be confidered as a crime by Lewis the Eleventh 9. The Hugonots confidered his death as a deliverance, and the manner of it as a judgment.

CHARLES, duke of Orleans, who, at his baptifur Acceffioned received the name of Maximilian, fucceeded to the throne Charles IX by the death of his brother, being between ten and eleven the conflayears of age'. The conflable who, on hearing of the ble recallking's illnefs, fet out from Chantilly, was by this time in joins with the neighbourhood of Orleans, to whom the queen-mothe Guifes ther wrote in the moft obliging terms, intreating him to and the make hafte to refume the functions of his office, and to reft marfbald e affured that the would do nothing but by his concurrence. told them they were in arms against their country, and that the perfon of the king was always fafe when furrounded by his people, upon which they immediately difperfed. The queen-mother had the chief authority, and the power of regent, but without affuming the title, though given her by most historians. The king of Navarre had the title of the king's lieutenant-general, and the prince of Condé was removed to La Fere, under a guard, until he fhould be declared innocent . On the 13th of December, the states were opened t. The speakers of the nobility and the commons inveighed bitterly against the negligence, luxury, and avarice of the clergy; the orator of the clergy, on the other hand, talked very high, demanded the abolition of the concordat, and the re-eftablishment of the pragmatic fanction. Some difcourfe there was of an enquiry into the flate of the finances; king Francis the First having left near two millions in his coffers, and the crown being at this time near forty-two millions in debt. But fo many of the great would have been interested in the event of this enquiry, and the Guifes were fo like to be little effected by it, that it was quickly ftopped. Some good laws in respect to the administration of justice, a fuspension of all religious perfecution, the restitution of the old cuftom of electing bifhops, and a general amnefty for what was paffed, being enacled, the ftates were prorogued to May. The conftable, duke of Guile, and marshal de St. André, entered into a close alliance, and were styled the Triumvirate: the queen-mother, upon , this affociation, leaned to the fide of the king of Navarre and the princes. In the month of March the prince of Condé was declared innocent by the council, and that declaration was confirmed by the parliament". On Eafter day the triumvirate communicated together, as a mark of . the fincerity of their reconciliation; and on the 15th of May the king was crowned at Rheims by the cardinal of Lorrain ". The admiral, who was a fincere protestant, perceiving how well the king of Navarre flood with the queen, and being perfuaded they had nothing to fear from the chancellor, prefented a new petition in favour of the Hugonots, which was referred to the confideration of the parliament, where the king, the queen, and most of the princes of the blood, were perfonally prefent. debates, it was decided by the plurality of voices, that all offences in respect to religion should be referred to the ecclefiaffical tribunals; all affemblies of the proteflants, though without arms, were forbidden upon pain of death, together with all preaching or celebration of the facraments, contrary to the ulage of the church of Rome. Some faid that John du Tillet was guilty of a fraud, in declaring the number of voices, and this edict was fo little relified in the provinces, that the queen-mother, who feemed now wholly inclined to the reformed, foftened it by another edict, dated from St. Germain en Laye ". A D.1651. The queen dowager returned to Scotland in the month of August ; and the affembly of the flates met again at Pontoife, where the clergy, to avert the ftorm that was rifing against them, taxed themselves in a large fum to the kingr. In the month of September was held the famous colloguy, or conference, at Poilli, between the prelates and the minifters, in which the cardinal of Lorrain and Theodore Beza difplayed their eloquence, notwithftanding which there was little or nothing done, except that the king of Navarre, under pretence that the minifters did not agree well amongst themselves, left the reformed, and joined the triumvirate ".

fenting to quit the court, as if it had been with a view to make the administration lefs difficult to the queen, though at the bottom they had the fame defign. The prince of Condé had treated with the duke of Wirtembergh for fuccours, in fupport of the protestant cause; the duke of Guife having an interview with that prince at Saverne, perfuaded him that himfelf, his brother, and the moderate Catholics, were not averfe to the Lutheran religion, but that the Hugonots in France were obstinate Calvinist, and equally enemies to both, by which infinuations he drew him into a treaty of neutrality . In his return to Paris, paffing thro' the little town of Paffi, his followers infulted the Hugonots who were at their devotion in a barn, proceeding from words to blows, tho' it is faid that the duke laboured all he could to put an end to the fray, in which he was himfelf wounded in the face by a ftone; there were about fixty of the Hugonots killed, and this fray gave a beginning to the civil ward. The triumvirate, in conjunction with the king of Navarre, prevented the prince of Condé and the admiral in furprizing the queen-mother and the king, whom they conducted from Fontainbleau to Paris . The Hugonots furprized Orleans, Bourges, Lyons, Poicliers, Tours, Aungiers, Angoulefme, Rouen, Dieppe, Havre de Grace, and other places; and having concluded a treaty with queen Elizabeth, put the last-mentioned place into her hands, by way of depofit, in confideration of a fuccour in men and money f.

The battle of Dreux, in which the confrable and the prince of Condé are both made prifoners.

On the other hand, the marshal de St. André marched into Poitou with an army, and recovered Poictiers; and the king of Navarre, with the title of lieutenant-general of the realm, having under him the conftable and the duke of Guile, first recovered Bourges, towards the close of the month of September, and then belieged Rouen. On the 15th of October the king of Navarre received a wound in the trenches, of which he died in thirty days; but this accident did not hinder the place from being taken by ftorm and plundered, or his making his entry into it through the breach in a litter 5. The lofs of Rouen obliged the prince of Condé to direct his march towards Normandy, where, on the 19th of December, the two armies engaged near Dreux. The forces of the triumvirs confifted of three thousand gens d'arms, and thirteen thousand foot, the marshal St. André commanded the first line, the conftable the fecond, and the duke of Guife and his friends, with the flower of the army, formed the third. The conftable was fo defirous of acquiring the fole honour of the victory, that he charged precipitately, and not being fupported in time, either by the first or third line, was defeated, wounded, and taken priloner. The A.D.1362. Hugonots beginning to plunder, the duke of Guife, having rallied the broken troops, attacked, them with fuch fury, that they were quickly routed, and the prince of Condé wounded and taken ; the marshal de St. André. purfuing too far, was furrounded and killed by the fon of one Bobignib, whofe confifcation he had begged. The admiral retired with the cavalry, and the remains of the prince of Conde's army, in a manner that did him great honour. The triumvirs kept the field, but their lofs was by much the greateft.

The duke of Guife was now in poffellion of as great Sieve of Orauthority as ever he had enjoyed in the former reign; for leans, death the queen-mother, who had shewn herself partial in fa- of the duke vour of the Hugonots, had loft much of her credit and of Guile, authority, and but for the mildness of the king of Na- and the first varre's temper, might have loft her life; for the herfelf the reoverheard the marshal de St. André affirm, in one of their formed. confultations, that things would never go well till the was thrown into the river. But while this ftruggle for power, which in truth was the great object of the war, continued in France, the concerns of the monarchy fuffered not a little. The duke of Savoy recovered almost all the places that the French still held in Piedmont; and the emperor demanded and might have regained Metz, Toul, and Verdun, if he had not fuffered himfelf to be amufed by a treaty of marriage. The duke of Guife faw this inconvenience with chagrin, and therefore refolved to put as fpeedy an end to the war as poffible. With this view he belieged Orleans, where, on the 9th of Februarv, he was fhot in the back . by Poltrot de Meré, who being taken and put to the torture, charged the admiral, the prince of Condé, Dandelot, Soubife, and Theodore Beza, with having excited him to this action ; but he afterwards acquitted the prince, Soubife, and Dandelot. He was carried to Paris.

and drawn to pieces by horfes. The queen fent for the marshal de Brifac to continue the fiege, but at the fame time laboured affiduoufly to conclude a peace, in order to which the directed a conference to be held between the prince of Condé and the constable, and they not agreeing, fhe herself prefcribed the terms. The Protestants were to lay down their arms, reftore the places which were in their poffeffion, and to renounce their treaty with England: in return, they had a general pardon and liberty of confcience<sup>d</sup>. As the great point aimed at was the recovery of Havre de Grace, war was declared against England; and the prince of Condé, whom the queen had gained by promiling to make him lieutenant-general of the kingdom, diftinguished himself in this siege against his old allies. The place was furrendered on the 28th of July, by means of a forged letter fent to the earl of Warwick . The king was declared of age, at thirteen years and a day old, by the parliament of Rouen, notwithstanding the opposition given by that of Paris, which was at length forced to comply. The prince of Condé preffing thequeen-mother for the performance of her promife, and the Protestants taking great liberties with her character, which was none of the most regular, the became, out of fpite, a most zealous Catholic, who, but a year before, had shewn her approbation of the Protestant doctrine, in A.D. 1563. a letter to pope Pius the Fourth f. The widow and children of the duke of Guife demanded justice against the admiral, contrary to the dying commands of the duke, who forgave all who had any concern in his death, and earneftly recommended the extinction of all animofities amongst the great men of the kingdom. The admiral protefted his innocence, and the king took the caufe into his own hands. On the last day of the year died the marshal de Brifac, one of the bravest men, and best officers in France s.

The queen-mother had now none to oppofe or controul her; but the fituation of public affairs was fuch, as required a vaft capacity to comprehend and to conduct them. The pope, the king of Spain, and the duke of Savoy, fent their ambaffadors into France, to folicit certain points which they had much at heart. The former was defirous of having the decrees of the council of Trent admitted and recognized, and for this recognition he depended much upon the cardinal of Lorrain : but, upon the review of them by the parliament, it was refolved, that, in refpect to doctrine and point of faith, the council flould be received, but not with respect to matters of discipline, becaufe these were equally inconfistent with the rights of the Gallican church and the late edict of pacification. The latter laboured to engage the crown of France in a league for the utter extirpation of Protestants; but the queen, clearly perceiving that this was defigned to revive the troubles in France, in which both his catholic majefty and the duke of Savoy had their feparate interefts at heart, fhe, in appearance at least, declined it. The negociation with England ftill fublifted, which had been begun foon after the reduction of Havre de Grace, and at length a peace was concluded, which was equally neceffary to both kingdoms h. The queen, under pretence of vifiting his dominions, carried the king from place to place, and at length into Lorrain, where the proposed to have had an interview with the emperor, which was difappointed chiefly by the intrigues of king Philip. Thence the court went into Burgundy, and afterwards to Lyons, where a citadel was directed to be built. The Catholics were reftlefs, and defirous of having recourfs again to arms, through the infligations of the emiffaries of Spain and the house of Guise; but the queen affected, for in truth it was but affectation, a fpirit of equity and moderation. However, being arrived at Roufillon, a palace belonging to the counts of Tournon, in Dauphine, the there publiflied an edict in the king's name, reftraining the Protestants from the exercise of their religion, within ten leagues of the court 1. About this time likewife the date A.D. 1554. of the year was fixed at the first of January, instead of -Eafter; and fome other things were done, in appearance, for the public good, but which, at the bottom, tended to facilitate the queen's defign, which was to conduct the ruin of the Protestants in fuch a manner, as not to endanger her own authority. She likewife found means to renew the alliance between the crown of France and the Swifs cantons, notwithstanding all the endeavours of Phi-

The king fpent the winter in Provence and Languedoc. Conference at Bayonne, having with him the young duke of Guife, and most of the chiefs of the Catholics, who were apparently in high the ruin of favour. In the mean time an accident happened at Paris, the Protefwhich was very near reviving the war. The cardinal of tants is re-Lorrain advanced into the neighbourhood of that city, attended by a confiderable body of horfe, well armed; the marshal de Montmorency, who was governor of the Isle of France, fent a meffage defiring him to difarm his attendants, of which he took no notice, but entered Paris with this martial equipage. He was met, however, by the marshal with a body of troops, who difarmed his attendants, and killed in his prefence one of his pages, who made fome refiftance. Both fides complained to the court. and, at the fame time, made preparations of a warlike nature; but finding that the king would not decide in favour of either party, they were afraid to proceed farther k. The court, after having vifited Bourdeaux, went to Bayonne, where the queen and her fon had an interview with her daughter the queen of Spain and the duke of Alva<sup>1</sup>. All poffible precautions were taken to difguife and keep fecret what paffed in these conferences; but even thefe precautions, and this air of mystery, made it evident, that the queen-mother was not fincere in her profeflions, but had ftill an inclination to enter into the league for the deftruction of the Protestants, and the event fully A.D. 1565. justified these conjectures. Immediately after this interview the king went into Bearn, where the queen of Navarre was obliged to reftore to the Catholics their churches. and to admit of a mixed magistracy of both communions, though the bulk of her fubjects were Protestants; and the fame method was purfued in other provinces, as the king returned towards Paris m.

Her intrigues with the court of Spain end in a new civil war.

In the beginning of the enfuing year, the court fummoned to Moulins, in the Bourbonnois, the deputies from the feveral parliaments and other fovereign courts throughout the kingdom, in order to take effectual measures for the re-establishment of justice; and accordingly the famous ordinance, bearing date from thence, was published, confifting of fourfcore and fix articles ". This was the effect of the chancellor's policy, who, finding his councils lefs regarded in matters of ftate, applied himfelf affiduoufly to those of his own profession, and, bending his whole endeavours to the public good, procured, in thefe times of confusion, more falutary laws to be made than in any other reign. As he shewed the uprightness of his heart in contriving, fo his comprehensive capacity, and at the fame time his learning and eloquence, are rendered confpicuous to posterity, by the elegant manner in which they are penned. The reconciliation which was attempted here between the Montmorencies and the cardinal of Lorrain. and between the admiral and the houfe of Guife, had a happy iffue in fhew, without producing any good effect; for, notwithstanding the outward ceremonies of agreement and forgivenefs, all parties retained their fecret animolities, and a full refolution of gratifying them the first fair occasion that should offer °. This spirit of diffimulation went still higher; the king of Spain laboured to possels the court of France with an opinion, that the great object of his policy was to extinguish herefy, and that his aim was to act in concert with the crown of France, though, at the fame time, he laboured in Germany, in Italy, and Switzerland, to lessen the influence and credit of this crown, and to prevent the fuccefs of those negociations which the queen was carrying on. On the other hand the queen-mother pretended to have a high jealoufy of king Philip's proceedings, and fpoke her fentiments of them, as it were in confidence, to the prince of Condé and the admiral; but, at the fame time, fhe had quite other projects in her mind : and believing herfelf able to deal with the king of Spain in his own way, refolved to take in his affistance for the destruction of the Protestants. But as, in all great undertakings, money is the material article, the made a vaft reform in the finances. Contrary to the advice of the most zealous Catholics, she difbanded great part of the troops that had been kept on foot fince the late troubles, not more with a view of retrenching expence, than to deceive the prince of Condé and the Hugonots P. To purfue thefe dark politics more effectually, the fent an ecclesiaftic to the court of Spain, to let king Philip into her plan, that he might not take umbrage at the advices he received from his ambaffador in France, who could not but be alarmed at the countenance given by the queen to the prince of Condé, notwithstanding his open declarations that the measures taken by the Spaniards in Italy were to be fuspected; and that an army ought to be raifed to watch the motions of the duke of Alva. The conftable having laboured ineffectually to refign his charge to his fon the marshal de Montmorenci, gave way to a proposition made by the prince of Condé, to relign in his favour, a ftep which did not a little embarrafs the court. However, the queen foon found an expedient to prevent this fcheme from taking effect, which was by prompting her fon Henry, duke of Anjou, to declare himfelf the prince of Conde's competitor, which he did with fuch airs of grandeur and fuperiority, that the prince was not a little mortified 9. The admiral, and his brother Dandelot, by degrees, penetrated through all thefe mysteries; and gave the prince to understand, that, if he was upon ill terms with the king and his brother, he was upon much worfe with the queen-mother; who, while the pretended to liften to his apprehensions of the Catholic king's defigns, and in confequence of them, as he imagined, had given orders for the levying of fix thousand Swifs, was in reality preparing to fecond that monarch's fcheme, and would employ those troops in concert with A.D.1566, him against the Protestants. The prince of Orange gave him the like intimations; and the king having difcovered his refentment that the princes of Germany fhould inter-, pose in favour of his Protestant subjects, and that their minifters had conferred with the prince, he was at length convinced that he had been all along the dupe of the queen. and that he himfelf and those of his religion had no other way to fecure their fafety than by putting themfelves, without lofe of time, in a pofture of defence '.

The march of the duke of Alva into the Low Countries feemed to alarm the court extremely, and occafioned the forming of a flying camp in Burgundy, though in truth the queen-mother was preparing to act in concert with him, and the Hugonots were every day more and more curtailed in their privileges, as if it had been defigned to provoke them to take arms, and thereby afford the court an opportunity of treating them with the fame feverity flewn by the duke of Alva to their brethren in the Low Countries. Indeed there want not fome who fay, that as the duke put to death the counts of Egmont and Horn, for no other crime than their inviolable attachment to the liberties of their country, fo the queen-mother was firmly refolved to lay hold of the first opportunity of feizing the prince of Condé and the admiral, to confine the former as long as he lived, and bring the latter to the fcaffold. It is at leaft certain that the prince and the admiral believed themfelves in the utmost danger, and thereupon formed the bold defign of furprifing the whole royal family at Monceaux, in Brie. With this view, orders were given privately to the chiefs of the party to affemble as many determined men as they could bring together with privacy, and to march with all poffible fecrecy, at a certain day, to the little town of Rofoy, which was but a fmall diflance from Monceaux, where the court had fcarce any troops about them, though the fix thouland Swifs, under the command of colonel Pfiffer, were at no great diflance'. This defign was conducted with fo much addrefs, that, but for an unforefeen accident, it would have certainly fucceeded. The count of Castelneau had been sent into Flanders to compliment the duke of Alva on the part of the king, and perhaps to concert fome meafures with him against the Protestants; the count was going to court to report the fuccefs of his committion, and, in his paffage, fell in upon the road with fome of the Hugonots, who were going to their rendezvous, and out of thefe he picked their defign t. When he came to relate this difcovery at court, the conftable treated it as a dream; but the queen-mother, more eafily alarmed, caufed fuch enquiry to be made, as put the fact beyond doubt. The court hurried away to Meaux, and the Swifs troops having orders to march thither, performed it in the night. On Michaelmas-day the prince of Condé, the admiral, and their affociates, affembled their forces, and found themfelves in a condition of belieging Meaux, to which, if they had marched directly, without fuffering themfelves to be amufed by a negociation, they would have done their bufinefs. The court was equally afraid of being invefted in Meaux, or of marching from thence to Paris without cavalry ". The latter expedient was at last adopted, on the faith of colonel Pfiffer, who undertook and performed this retreat of ten leagues, through an open country, continually exposed to the enemy's horfe, by whom they were harafied all the way, the queen-mother, with the king and the reft of her children, being in the center of the battalion, and exceedingly exposed. The Swifs had a month's pay given them for this fervice, as if they had gained a battle ".

Thus the fecond civil war was begun : the prince of Condé, far from being disconcerted by this disappointment, furprised the town of St. Denys, and fet fire to twenty-four windmills that were just without the fuburbs of Paris *. The thing is in itfelf fo ftrange, or rather incredible, that if we had not the concurrent teftimony of all the writers of those times, it could never gain belief, that, with fcarce three thoufand men, the prince kept this capital blocked up for near fix weeks, and the people of Paris were at length fo much distressed, that by their clamours and reproaches, they wore out the patience of the conftable; fo that, on the 10th of November, he marched to attack them in the plain of St. Denys. His army confifted of three thousand men at arms and fixteen thousand foot, the prince of Condé had not above twelve hundred foot and fifteen hundred horfe; yet he was fo far from flying, that he began the action, which lasted about three hours, with the loss of fome hundreds on each fide, the Catholics keeping the field of battle, and the Hugonots, though they had the greatest loss, had all the honour of the day y. The conftable, being abandoned by those about him, was mortally wounded by Robert Stuart ; though feventy-four years of age, he flarted from the ground, and, with the pomel of his fword, ftruck Stuart in the face, beat out three of his teeth, and broke his jaw 2. His fon Danville, and the duke of Aumale, carried him to Paris, where he died two days after: the queen caufed him to be buried with royal honours; but it was a point much disputed, whether fhe was better fatisfied with the victory fhe had gained than with the death of this great man. On the 15th of November the prince of Condé and the admiral, with the remains of their forces, marched into Lorrain, to meet the fuccours that were coming to them out of Germany, commanded by prince Calimir, the fon of the elector Palatine, confifting of four thousand foot and fix thousand horse: the queen-mother caused her fon the duke of Anjou to be declared the king's lieutenant-general, to avoid naming a conftable, and fent him with all the forces that could be affembled, to harrafs the prince's rear . In the mean time the flame of war fpread itself through all the provinces, the reformed ftanding every where upon their defence, and making themfelves mafters of all the places they were able to reduce; while the papifts, having the royal authority on their fide, had recourfe both to arms and to justice, destroying indiferiminately, by the forms of justice or by the fword, as many as they were able, to the great fatisfaction of the Spaniards, who enjoyed this madnefs of their neighbours, as appeared clearly by the conduct of the duke of Alva. If this general had fent, as the conftable required, a little before the battle of St. Denys, a body of four or five thoufand men. at the back of the Hugonot army, they must have been furrounded, and an end put to the war at once b.

It is commonly believed that, if it had not been for The queen fome ill conduct of the duke of Anjou, or rather of those contents to who commanded the army at the head of which he was, a true, in order to enthe forces of the prince of Condé and the admiral might (nare the have been difperfed, whereas they had the good fortune heads of the to join the fuccours that came to them out of Germany, Proteflants. under the command of prince Calimir, at Pont a Mouffon. There happened, upon this occasion, a very fingular event ; the prince had promifed his German fuccours a hundred thousand crowns as foon as they joined him, and they infifted upon the money, though there could not be any thing more miferable than the prince's army, who, for the most part, were without arms, without cloaths, and without floes; however, fome little money they had amongst them, and they collected the whole, and gave it to these ftrangers . With these forces the prince traversed a great part of the kingdom, and at length befiged Chartres, in the beginning of February, which was very gallantly defended by monfieur Lignieres, knight of the order; but if the prince had turned the course of the river at last as he did at first, the place must have furrendered. While the prince was employed in this fiege, the negociations were renewed, and, when the place was on the point of furrendering, the peace was concluded by the prince of Condé, against the advice of the admiral<sup>4</sup>.

A.D.1568. The conditions were, that the edict of pacification should be renewed, free from all limitations of time, place, or perfon; that the king fhould take upon him the payment of prince Caffimir and his Germans; that all places fhould be reftored. Both fides exclaimed against this peace, which neither intended to keep, and which was therefore ftyled the Feigned or the Short Peace; and yet they could not avoid making it; for, upon the furrender of Chartres, the king must have quitted Paris, and the queenmother knew not what the confequences might have been of fuch a step. On the other hand, the prince faw troops marching in fupport of the Catholic caufe from Germany and Italy, the Protestants, for the prefent, undone in the Low Countries, and himfelf in danger hourly of being abandoned or betrayed by the Germans, whom it was not in his power to pay, and who, for that reafon, were very defirous of peace, that they might become the creditors of those who were in better circumstances : the court were fo much aware of this circumstance, that they borrowed a hundred thousand crowns from the republic of Venice, and eighty thousand more of the dukes of Florence, Sancerre, and Montauban; feveral places of Querci, Vivares, Dauphiné, and Languedoc, refused to return to their obedience; Rochelle shut their gates against the king's garrifon, and became from that time the bulwark of the reformed.

An attempt to seize the prince of Condé and the admiral causes the third civil war.

The queen-mother began now to form a kind of felect council, who were first flyled the Cabinet; these confisted of the duke of Anjou, whom, from his childhood, fhe bred up in arts and intrigues, the chancellor Lewis la Lanfac, John de Marvillieres, bishop of Orleans, Sebaftian de l'Aubefpine, bishop of Limoges, Henry de Mesme, the prefident Birague, and the fecretary de Villeroy. Amongst these, however, there were still fome who stood in higher confidence, and whole fentiments the retailed to the reft as her own . The cabinet advifed her to canton the forces throughout the kingdom, fo as to keep fuch places as had not fubmitted in a manner blocked up, and to have fuch an eye on the chiefs of the Hugonots, as that they fhould not be able to break out again, or to furprife any great towns on the fudden; which advice the queen caufed to be punctually carried into execution. But the counfel by which the was chiefly guided came from the cardinal of Lorrain, and the prefident Birague, and it imported that the thould deftroy privately, and under a variety of pretences, as many of the Hugonots as poffible, more efpecially fuch as had been most active, and in laying fchemes for furprifing the prince and the admiral, whenever they flould be in the fame place. This was the cafe at Nojars in Burgundy, where the admiral came to pay the prince a vifit, upon which the marshal de Tavannes received orders to block up the place, and to make them both prifoners; but the troops could not be fo fuddenly put in motion as to prevent their having intelligence, and they immediately retired, or rather fled, with the utmost expedition ' to Rochelle, leaving an officer and a few horfe to cover their rear, who, being routed, was made prisoner, and fent up to court; an indisputable proof that the prince and admiral had not fled without caufe, as the court pretended. The queen perceiving the chancellor was little affected at this mifcarriage, the threw the blame upon him, and, having deprived him of the feals, gave them to the bishop of Orleans, though it afterwards appeared it was the marshal Tavannes himself who caused the prince to be advertifed of his danger, as being unwilling to do what he thought would reflect upon his honour s. The prince of Condé was no fooner at Rochelle than the whole force of the Protestants reforted thither ; the queen of Navarre particularly, with her fon the prince of Bearn, afterwards Henry the Fourth, with all the forces of Guienne; those beyond the Loire were affembled and conducted by Dandelot, in fpite of the king's troops, which were much superior to them in all respects. Queen Elizabeth, forgetting the ill ufage fhe had met with from that prince, and respecting only her own interest, and that of the Protestant caufe, fent him a hundred thousand crowns, a train of artillery, and a great quantity of ammunition, which enabled him to march with his army to Soiffons ; and thus the third civil war broke out, within fix months after the last peace h.

The queen-mother fuspended the progress of his arms Frince of by a negociation, and promised, in order to make him Conde flain eafy under the delay, to give him wherewithal to pay his *in the bat-*the of fartroops; but as that measure would have been advantageous nac. to him, and prejudicial to her own affairs, the avoided it, by the ufual expedient of breaking her word. The rigour of the winter being over, the duke of Anjou was in the field with a numerous army, whom the queen employed, though a child, that fhe might direct the troops as abfolutely as the did the counfels of her fon. This young general had about his perfon the marshal Tavannes, who had merited the bâton by fifty years fervice, was equally: prudent and brave, and withal of fo bold a fpirit, that he offered queen Catherine de Medicis, in her husband's time, to cut off the nofe of Diana de Poitiers. He was the determined enemy of the Protestants, becaufe, having once had a difference with the admiral, he gave him fome hard language i. This marshal had the queen's fecrer. and, in effect, commanded her fon. Next to him was the marshal de Cosse, the younger brother of the famous marshal de Brifac, a gallant man, a good officer, but much addicted to wine and women. There was alfo Monf. de Biron, who became afterwards a marshal of France, of whom it is unnecessary to fay any more than that, though a Protestant by inclination, he was a very good Catholic for the fake of preferment. By their advice the duke of Anjou laboured to engage the prince of Condé, before he was joined by a great corps of German fuccours that were marching to his relief, under the command of the duke of Deux Ponts. This aim he effected on the 13th of March, at the little village of Jarnac, in the province of Angoulefme. The action was neither long nor bloody, there not being above fourteen hundred killed of the Hugonots, who were defeated, and not more than two hundred of the victors k. The prince of Condé, who had the misfortune to have his leg broke a little before the action began, endeavoured for that reafon to decline it ; but. being once engaged, behaved, notwithstanding his wound, like a hero, till having received feveral more, he was taken; but fo weak through lofs of blood, that two gentlemen took him in their arms from his horfe and carried him to a bufh, at fome diftance, where they fet him down; then the baron de Montesquieu, captain of the guards to the duke of Anjou, riding up to the place where he was, came behind and fhot him through the head<sup>1</sup>. This deteftable action, though not avowed by the duke, was generally afcribed to his infligation, as he did

There were few who equalled him in valour, conftancy, wit, addrefs, experience, courtefy, eloquence, and liberality. Even his enemies allowed that, taking the whole of his character into view, he was not excelled by any of the great men of that age. But he had alfo his follies and his faults. He was thought not very fincere in his religion; he was ambitious; he was too hafty in embracing, and had too great a facility in finding excufes for quitting his party. But his great foible was his paffion for women. The queenmother had about her abundance of pretty women, who were flyled her fyrens, and, with their help, she extracted the fecrets, and frequently influenced the conduct of those who were most averse to her. Mrs. Limaliel was the fyren that charmed the prince of Condé; who, proving with child by him, the queen publicly reprimanded her, and turned her out of the court. But the unfortunate lady, deriving courage from her defpair, told her, that however wicked and infamous her behaviour might be, it was the fruit of her advice, the effect of her command, and the transcript of her example. The prince's first confort was Eleonora de Roy, eldeit daughter of the count de Rouci, one of the worthiest women in France. He afterwards married Frances, the daughter of the marquis de Rothelin. In the month of May the duke of Deux Ponts, with his Germans, took la Charité by ftorm, and paffed the Loire; he died foon after, and his forces joined the admiral, who, having now a formidable army, unluckily undertook the fiege of Poitiers °. Henry duke of Guife threw himfelf into the place, with two thousand brave men, and gained as much reputation by defending it, as his father did by defending Metz. The duke of Anjou. in the beginning of September, befieged Chatelleraud, upon which the admiral raifed the fiege of Poitiers, burnt part of his baggage, having loft four thousand men, and much diminished his reputation. The parliament, to increafe his embarrafiment, declared him a rebel, and fet a price of fifty thousand crowns on his head, and they took the fame ftep with refpect to the vidame of Chartres, and the count de Montgomery P. At the close of the month the duke of Anjou gained fome advantage at St. Cler, on which the admiral decamped without found of trumpet. The Germans mutinied a few days after, and compelled him to fight on the 3d of October, at Moncontour<sup>9</sup>. The action began about eight in the morning, and was over by ten. The French infantry in the Hugonot army behaved ill, and the German horfe being put in fome diforder, retired. The admiral loft half his army, moft of his baggage, and all his artillery, a difafter which was afcribed to the skilful disposition made by Tavannes. The whole force of the Protestants seemed now to be broken. but the fpirit of the admiral remained entire. Wounded and defeated he drew together the remains of his army, retired in good order, and neglected nothing that was practicable to recruit his troops . The victorious army, instead of pushing him, besieged St. John de Angeli, in which Piles, an officer of the houfe of Clermont, commanded a garrifon of two thousand men; the place was far from being ftrong, and very indifferently fortified; but Piles comprehending clearly, that the prefervation of the Protestants in France depended on the length of the fiege, rejected all propositions, and defended it with incredible refolution. The king and queen-mother went thither about the middle of October, that they might have the fatisfaction of feeing the place taken by florm, and were afterwards content to hope it would be reduced by famine. The commander made no fcruple of declaring A.D.1569; that he could not truft to any capitulation, and at length, having nothing to eat, took the defperate refolution of forcing a paffage, which was prevented by the interpofition of Monf. de Biron, on whofe word he accepted honourable terms, on the 2d of December, and then marched out with one hundred horfe and eight hundred foot ". Rochelle was, all this time, blocked up by fea and land, and, at the close of the year, the Protestant cause in France feemed at the point of being overwhelmed, their forces being, in a manner, quite exhausted, at the fame time that they were without any visible refource.

Monf. la Noue, one of the bravest amongst the Hugonots, undertook to extend their quarters; and, after having taken feveral places, gained a confiderable advantage at Lucon, which left his party more at their eafe, and facilitated their receiving recruits. The two young princes of Bearn and Condé undertook a perilous march, with all the horfe and foot they could affemble, in order to join the count de Montgomery, who commanded in the territories of the queen of Navarre. This they performed, and, by plundering the country about Thouloufe, quieted the German cavalry, who were be-come importunate for money*. They would, in all probability, have become mafters of Bourdeaux, if the famous Montluc had not found means, by cutting down a mill, to break the bridge, which, with infinite difficulty, they had thrown over the Gironne. This circumstance constrained them to make a retreat that was no lefs difficult than their march, and which they likewife executed with equal ardour and addrefs '. But, after all, it became abfolutely neceffary to have recourse once more to the German princes, and to traverfe all France with their fmall remaining force, in order to join thefe fuccours. The admiral undertook this, one of the most difficult enterprizes he had ever attempted, and performed it with equal abilities and fuccefs. The marshal de Coffe, during the indifpolition of the duke of Aniou, commanded the king's army, and with it ftopped the admiral at Arnai le duc. in Burgundy. In the course of these expeditions the Hugonot army had marched twelve hundred miles, pillaged above fifty and ranfomed a hundred places, traverfed feven or eight provinces, paffed a multitude of rivers, penetrated forests, and taken their route through moraffes that were thought impracticable; and now with four thousand men, were, in the midst of an enemy's country. to fight an army of ten thousand regular troops, well provided, who had a good train of artillery, though the Protestants had not a fingle piece of cannon. The marshal de Coffe is blamed for his behaviour, but it may be without caufe. The admiral chofe a field of battle upon a hill, on the fides of which there were feveral deep roads that covered his foot from cannon-fhot. His horfe, compofed of gentlemen, and commanded by princes, defeated those of the marshal, but without pursuing them, that they might not lofe the advantage of ground, the only advantage they had w. At length they flipped him; and, being unincumbered with baggage or artillery, made fome equivocal motions, that looked as if they intended to block up Paris: thefe conftrained the marfhal to difpofe his forces in fuch a manner as to cover that great city, and fo alarmed the queen, who had all this time kept up a negociation, in which the Protestants, for the credit of their cause, which, at this juncture, sublisted entirely upon credit, made very high demands, directed her plenipotentiaries to fign, as they did, the third peace, at St. Germain en Laye, on the 8th of August *.

This peace confifted of forty-fix articles, and was as favourable to the Proteflants as if they had been victorious in all the battles in which they had been defeated. The edicts in their favour were confirmed, those against them recalled; they were reflored to all their employments and dignities, and had the following firong places ceded to them for two years; namely, Rochelle, La Charité, Mont-

auban, and Coignac; the first kept the fea open for receiving fuccours from England, in cafe of a new war : the fecond preferved the paffage of the Loire; the third was on the frontiers of Languedoc and Querci; and the fourth opened a paffage into Angoumois, where they had a greater ftrength than in any other province. The peace was hardly figned before both fides manifested a discontent, the Papifts with great reafon, the Protestants becaufe they could not believe it fincere. The king appeared in a new point of light. He certainly wanted not talents either for peace or war, though his education, or rather his want of education, had been fuch as did not qualify him for either. He affected very much to be a king; he was now about twenty; and, though paffionate, commonly effeemed goodnatured. He took the peace upon himfelf, and gave broad hints that he had made it in fpite of the queen-mother. the Spaniards, and the Guifes: he fent the marshal de Coffe to Rochelle, to fettle every thing that was to be done in confequence of the peace. His inftructions were fo clear, and his behaviour fo honourable in the conduct of this commission, that the admiral, who had no opportunity of knowing him, flattered himfelf that things had taken a new turn, fince the king undertook to govern for himfelf; and, in all applications made to the court, the decisions were fuch as feemed to confirm these favourable opinions y. The negociation that had been depending nine years for the king's marriage, was at length terminated. On the 6th of November, he espoufed at Mezieres, Elizabeth of Austria, daughter to the emperor Maximilian. a princefs of incomparable virtues, who, in the bloom of youth, had the fagacity of age, and maintained, in the midft of a voluptuous court, a purity of manners that would have done honour to a convent, without any tincture of affectation or aufterity z. The Spanish faction and the Guifes knew not what to think of this fudden change of affairs, and were fill more alarmed by the unexpected turn given to an event of their own procuring. Don Sebaftian king of Portugal had demanded in marriage the princefs Margaret, the king's fifter, then about the age of feventeen ; which marriage had been traverfed by the Spanifh minifter, feemingly, in complaifance to the houfe of Guife, but in reality for other reasons. The king intimated his defign of marrying his fifter to the prince of Na-

Upon difcovering an amour very far advanced between her and the duke of Guife, he fent for his baftard brother, Henry d'Angoulesme, into his bed-chamber, and, thewing him two fwords, faid with many imprecations, " Here is one to kill you, if you do not kill the duke of Guife with the other, before I come from hunting." The duke of Guife being informed of the king's refentment, and knowing the violence of his temper, retired from court, and not long after married a widow *.

Seems to take the reins of government into hisown to confult his true interefts.

It was apparent, from the new turn things took, in confequence of this extraordinary change of meafures, that the peace and power of France might have been effectually eftablished, if Charles the Ninth had kept these royal and hands, and national points in view, and had honourably practifed to that end those measures which, for the vilest of all purpofes, he most bafely diffembled. He likewife shewed abilities upon this occasion that might have done him credit upon a better; and though it may be fuspected, and perhaps proved, that he was entirely directed by the queen-mother, who had now put the feals into the hands of her own creature Birague, and was furrounded by her Italian council, yet if he had done what he pretended he had a mind to do, that is, difmiffed all those who had been deep in the late troubles, recalled the chancellor, the Montmorencys, and fome of the princes of the blood who were Catholics, the peace of the nation would have been fecured, and the luftre of the government reftored. But this was far from being the cafe ; he counterfeited good qualities which he never poffeffed ; and, while he really difplayed them, produced fuch a transient fcene of profperity, as must have influenced him, if there had been a spark of goodness in his nature, to change his conduct, and become the man he feemed b. The regard he fhewed to justice in points that came before him in council, revived the refpect due to it throughout the kingdom. His fubjects admired, his neighbours courted and revered him : he renewed his treaties with England, with the princes of Germany, and the grand duke of Tufcany. He avoided, with great dexterity, entering into the alliance against the Turks, because it was styled the holy league, and he thought it might revive the fears of the Protestants. On this occasion he made one of those mys-

He meditated his defign continually, and, without difclofing it to any, threw out a multitude of expressions which were taken in one fense at the time, and which, when it was too late, were difcerned to be capable of quite another. This flewed he had digefted the maxims of his mother's politics thoroughly, and was capable of fetting a good face upon the blackeft and most barbarous intention that ever entered the human breaft.

The king was not court. content to let him know that he approved and admired his conduct, but defired that he would fend count Lodovic of Naffau to confer with him on certain points of importance, and, that this might be done with the more fafety and fecrecy, he should come incognito d. He carefied count Lodovic in fuch a manner, entertained him fo freely on the project he pretended to have formed of attacking Spain and conquering the Low Countries, and gave him fuch a mark of his fincerity, in reftoring the principality of Orange to his brother, that he entirely gained the count, and fent him back fo well fatisfied to the admiral, that he removed all his fcruples, and made him not only willing, but defirous, of going to court. The king did not fail to invite him, but it was in fo eafy and natural a way, that he might have excufed himfelf, if he had been disposed. He came, however, in the month of September, to Blois attended by fifty gentlemen . He was received with equal affection and refpect; the king killed him; called him father; and, when he embraced him, faid, "We have you now fast; you must not think of getting from us when you pleafe f." He reftored him, unafked, the penfions that had been granted in the former reigns; and made him a prefent belides of one hundred thousand livres. However, when he asked his majesty's leave to go to his houfe at Chatillon, he very readily granted it; adding, when he mentioned fome improvements that were making there, " We know very well how fond you are of gardening," which alluded to the perfon's finding him in his vineyard, with a pruning knife in his hand, immediately before the expedition of Meaux, when the king was obliged to fly before him to Paris. After a month or five weeks ftay, he fent for him back, under pretence that he wanted to confult him about his negociations with England, and other affairs of importance s. It was at this time that he talked fo frankly and fenfibly on the poffibility of his fubjects of the two communions living in charity to each other, and in duty to their prince, and the right he had, as fovereign of Flanders, to take the people under his protection, and of the deceitful ufage he had met with from the Spaniards, that the admiral was perfectly charmed. He was infinitely more careffed than he had been before ; and though he received the news of his A.D.1571. brother the cardinal's being poifoned in England, yet the concern the king expressed, and the grant he made him of the revenues of his brother's benefices for a year, effaced the fufpicions b. Indeed the king diffembled fo effectually, that the Guifes and the furious ecclefiaftics looked upon one another with amazement; the latter made no fcruple of affirming, that the king was in the highway of becoming a heretic, and the former were not a little afraid, that a monarch, who was fo complete a mafter of fraud and treachery, when he faw how much he had got by them, might turn these arts upon his teachers i.

Death of the queen of Navarte.

The treaty with England was at length, after much deliberation, concluded. The queen of Navarre coming to the court at Blois, was met by the queen-mother and by the king, who carefied her exceffively, called her his greataunt, and profeffed himfelf charmed with her politenefs and wifdom. At night he afked his mother if he had not acted his part well. She replied, that it was a good thing to fet out right; but that things were brought about by patience and perfeverance: to which oblervation the king anfwered, "Let me alone; I will bring them all into the net *." Count Lodowic of Naffau, was, by this time, returned to court, in order to obtain the performance of the king's promifes, who not only made them good, but exceeded them, intimating, that he wanted nothing but the admiral's advice to enter into action against the Spaniards; and it was this declaration that brought him the third time to court 4. In the beginning of the month of June the queen of Navarre was taken ill, and died on the 10th m. It was the current opinion of thole times, and many hiftorians fpeak of it as a thing certain, that the was poiloned by one Rene, an Italian glover, by fome perfumed goods which he fold her, by order of the queen-mother. It is, however, most likely, that this fufpicion had no foundation. Her body was opened, in which an abfeefs was formed that must have been mortal; and probably it was from their perfuafion of this truth, that the admiral, the prince of Condé, and the other great lords of the Hugonot party, not only remained at court, but were also lefs inclined to liften to the intelligence fent them from all quarters of France, that the court meditated their destruction ; which, as it was true, fo a little refiection will fuffice to fhew, that the poifoning the queen of Navarre at this juncture was inconfiftent with their general fcheme. Teligny, who was one of the fineit young gentlemen in France, and whofe merit alone had recommended him to the marriage of the admiral's daughter, was become a kind of declared favourite with the king, who had most effectually deceived him, and made use of him to detain the admiral, who had a great opinion of his fagacity and penetration. A little before the marriage, Langoiran, who had ferved under him in the war, came to take his leave of the admiral, who asked him why he could leave Paris'at that juncture: "Sir," faid he, " thefe people are too fond of us, and I had much rather fave myfelf with the fools, than ftay here and have my throat cut with those who are wifer "." The death of the queen of Navarre cauled the marriage of her fon to be put off, who, notwithstanding, came to Paris at the time appointed, and was greatly carefied. On the 17th of August he was af . fianced to the princefs Margaret by the cardinal of Bourbon, against the will of the princefs, who refused to fign the contract, and who, next day, would not fpeak when the marriage was celebrated; but the king her brother, ftanding behind, forced her to nod her head, which was

On Friday the 22d of August, as the admiral was walking from the court to his lodgings, about eleven in the morning, he received a fhot from a window in the ftreet, which carried away the fecond finger of his right-hand, and wounded him grievoully in the left-arm. He faid immediately, " This is the fruit of my reconciliation with the duke of Guife P." After dinner, the king went to make the admiral a vifit, and, amongst others, made him this compliment, "You have received the wound, but it is I that fuffer ;" defiring, at the fame time, that he would order his friends to quarter about his houfe, and promifing to prohibit the Catholics from entering that quarter after it was night. This behaviour fatisfied the admiral of the king's fincerity, and hindered him from complying with the defires of his friends, who would have carried him away, and who were ftrong enough to have forced a paffage out of Paris if they had attempted it.

In the evening the queen-mother held a cabinet council, re of the to fix the execution of that plot which the had meditated for fo many years. The members of this cabal were Henry duke of Anjou, afterwards king of Poland and of France, Gonzagua duke of Nevers, Henry of Angoulefme, grand-prior of France, and baftard brother to the king, the marshal de Tavannes, and Albert de Gondi, count de Rhetz : there it was determined to maffacre the Protestants in general; and it was with fome difficulty that the duke de Nevers and marshal Tavannes perfuaded them to fpare the king of Navarre, and the prince of Condé, together 9 with the marshals Montmorenci and Damville, who were at first doomed to flaughter with the reft. The direction of the whole defign was confided to the duke of Guife, who took with him his uncle the duke of Aumale, and the grand-prior Henry d'Angoulefme. The guards were appointed to be in arms, and the city officers were to difpose the militia to execute the king's orders, of which the fignal was the ringing of a bell near the Louvre '. which was that of midnight, the king grew indetermined; that he expressed his horror at the thought of thedding fo much blood, that of his fubiects, of men who came at his command, upon their confidence in his word, and particularly the admiral, whom he had detained fo lately by his carefles; but that the queen-mother reproached him with his cowardice, made a frightful picture of his danger, flattered him with the hopes of ruling without controul, and, having once wrung from him an order to give the fignal, hastened it, for fear he should alter his mind. These circumstances are not to be depended upon, because many writers vifibly labour to excufe the young monarch at the expence of his mother, while others make it fingly his act, affirming that, when it was proposed to take off a few of the heads, he cried out ', " If any are to die, let there not be one left to reproach me with breach of faith."

The duke of Guife and the chevalier d'Angouleime, ac- The cruel companied by many perfons of quality, and a detachment maffacre of of the Swifs troops of the Catholic religion, as foon as the the admiral fignal was given, attacked the house of the admiral Co-followed by ligni; who, as foon as he difcerned from the noife what that of all the matter was, role out of bed, and, while they were teftants. forcing the doors, addreffed himfelf, in a fhort prayer, to God, which was fcarce finished, before Besme, the most forward of the affaffins, entered the room, and afked if he was Coligni? 'To which he answered he was; adding, "Young man, respect these grey hairs;" he answered by thrufting his fword through his body '. The duke of Guife and the chevalier, growing impatient below-ftairs, cried out to know if the bulinefs was done; and, being told it was, commanded that the body fhould be thrown out of the window. As foon as it fell on the ground, the chevalier, or, as fome fay, the duke of Guife, wiping the blood off the face with his handkerchief, as foon as he knew the face, kicked it with his foot ". The body was then abandoned to the fury of the populace, who, after a feries of cruel and infolent affronts, dragged it to the common gallows, to which it was chained by the feet, the head being cut off, and carried to the queen-mother, who, it is faid, caufed it to be embalmed and fent to Rome w. burnt, and the reft fcorched. However, the miferable remains were, in the night, taken down, by the command of the marthal duke de Montinorenci, who caufed them to be honourably interred at Chantilly *. In the very Louvre, the gentlemen belonging to the king of Navarre. and the prince of Condé were murdered under the king's eye; two of them, wounded and purfued by the affaffins, fled into the bed-chamber of the queen of Navarre, and leaped upon her bed, befeeching her to fave their lives; and as the went to afk this favour of the queen-mother, two more, under the like circumstances, rushed into the room, and threw themfelves at her feet. The queen-mother came to the windows to enjoy these dreadful fcenes; and the king, feeing the Hugonots, who were lodged on the other fide of the river, flying, called for his long gun, and fired upon them y.

Confeguences of this barba rous altion avowed and boafted of by the king.

It is not within our province to purfue the ftory of this tragical event, through all its circumstances, which would require a work of confiderable length; we fhall only obferve that, within the fpace of three or four days, feveral thousands were deftroyed, by all the variety of cruel deaths that the most unbounded malice could invent. Peter Ramus, profeffor of philosophy and the mathematics, after being robbed of all he poffeffed, his belly being first ripped open, was thrown out of a window; the news of which cataftrophe fo affrighted Denis Lambin, the king's profeffor, that, though a zealous Catholic, he died of terror. The first two days the king denied the maffacre was perpetrated by his orders, and threw the whole blame upon the house of Guile; but on the 28th of August, he went to the parliament, avowed it, was complimented upon it, and directed a process against the admiral, by which his memory was fligmatifed as a traitor. Two innocent gentlemen, of respectable characters, were executed as accomplices in a confpiracy against the life of the king, the princes his brothers, the gueen-mother, and the king of Navarre, in order to fet the crown on the head of the young prince of Condé, a confpiracy which never exifted, but by owning of which they might have faved their lives; a proposition they rejected with contempt. They were executed by torch-light, and the king, the queen-mother, with the king of Navarre and the prince of Condé, carried thither by force, were spectators of this horrid act.

The other three were more upon their guard, and became thereby fanctuaries to fuch of their religion as took shelter in them. In some of the provinces, however, the governors gave but little countenance to the barbarities that were exercifed; and in others they abfolutely refused to execute them at all; alleging, that their fwords were at the king's command against his enemies, but not against his fubjects b. The king of Navarre was eafily prevailed upon to abjure the Protestant religion, and to fend an edict into his own dominions, forbidding the exercife of it; which, however, was not obeyed. The court had more trouble with the prince of Condé, who thewed great firmnels in his religion, though the king, who undertook his conversion, proposed the strongest argument in three words, Mafs, Death, or the Baftile . At length they brought his chaplain to abjure, and he perfuaded his mafter to follow his example, as the prince of Conti and the count de Soiffons did alfo. When it appeared that artifice would do nothing, and that the bloody matins of St. Bartholomew had actually cured the Protestants of their credulity, the court had recourfe to force. Biron had orders to invest Rochelle by land, while Strozzi with a fleet, and the baron de la Garde with a fquadron of gallies, blocked it up by fea °. In the mean time, other places having revolted, three armies were fet on foot; the first, under the command of the marshal Damville, was employed to reduce Sommiers; which, after an obstinate refistance of two months, was taken; but it ruined the army, fo that it was out of his power to take Nifmes. Monfieur Le Chaftre, with the fecond, belieged Sancerre, which, though neither ftrong nor well fortified, held out eight months; during which time there perished two thousand people in the town through famine; and a father is faid to have lived a week upon the body of his deceafed daughter. At length the place submitted, but upon tolerable terms. The third, commanded by the marquis de Villars, now made admiral, was fent into Guienne, and reduced the greatest part of that country: but the whole force of France was, in a manner, affembled before Rochelle, the fiege of which was commanded by the duke of Anjou, accompanied by his brother the duke of Alencon, the king of Navarre, the prince of Condé, the duke of Montpenfier, all the princes of the house of Guise, the duke of Nevers, the marshal de Cosse, and the flower of the French nobility. It lasted eight months, during which the belieged fultained nine general and twenty particular affaults, in one of which the duke d'Aumale was flain f. defended themfelves with the fame firmnels; difpoling all things with fuch prudence, that they enjoyed a good flate of health, and a tolerable fubfiftence; while the army without was equally exposed to famine and difeafes. The duke of Anjou himfelf would have been killed by a mufquet-ball, if a gentleman, whofe name was de Vigne, had not feen the man taking aim, and, pufhing the duke afide, received it into his own body h. The news arriving that the duke of Anjou was elected king of Poland, a general attack was made, and this failing, the duke, who had already loft four-and-twenty thousand men, resolved to make an end of the affair by a peace. The measures for this being concerted, the people of Rochelle furrendered, and intreated his highnefs to enter their town; which invitation, as it had been agreed beforehand, he refufed; the edicts of pacification were renewed, and the inhabitants of Rochelle promifed to be good fubjects for the future<sup>1</sup>. Thus ended the fourth civil war, by a peace which the court did not intend to keep, and to which the Protestants never trusted.

The miferies of France were daily augmented by new Henry duke difturbances; the king was grown excellively jealous of of Anjou his brother the duke of Anjou, who had been always his mother's favourite, and who, by being continually at the head of the army, had at least as much authority as his brother. The king was therefore extremely well pleafed at his election, and defired nothing fo much as to fee him fairly out of France. On the other hand, the duke of Anjou, who was made a king in a manner against his will, who loved an indolent and luxurious life, the conversation of feveral young men, whom he ftyled his friends, and the reft of the world his flatterers, till, in process of time, they fell upon a worfe appellation, and who was also vehemently enamoured of the princess of Condé, could not bear the thoughts of parting, notwithstanding the ambaffadors from Poland preffed him every day; and the king told their mother, that the kingdom was not large enough to hold them both k. The duke of Guife adhered to the duke of Anjou, and offered to fupport him if he had been inclined to ftay, whether his brother would or not; but, befides this, there was another formidable and dangerous faction, styled La Politiques ; these were indifferently of both religions, chiefly the more moderate Catholics, fuch as the Montmorencis, the marshal de Cosse, and monsseur de Biron. At the head of thefe was the duke of Alencon. who had a mind to fet afide one brother, and perhaps both. The king of Navarre and the prince of Condé had entered a little into his fchemes, which went no farther in appearance than redrefing the numberlefs diforders in the state, and excluding foreigners from the council. The Protestants, encouraged by this party, and knowing how little they had to expect either from the king or the duke of Anjou, began to form new demands, and fuch as they thought might afford them a real fecurity : to procure which, they fet on foot a general confederacy, that they might the better know, and the more cafily exert the force of their whole party; and the government was fallen fo low, that, in little more than a twelvemonth, it was deliberated whether, yielding to neceffity, they fhould not grant their own terms to those whom they had threatened to exterminate from the face of the earth. The king accompanied his brother towards the frontiers, not out of affection, but for fear he should fix himfelf, and raife a party in fome of the diftant provinces<sup>1</sup>. In this journey, however, he was feized with a kind of flow malignant fever, which, from the beginning, had a very dangerous appearance; and with regard to which, the queen-mother expreffed herfelf strangely, when she took leave of the king of Poland in Lorrain, "Go, fon (faid she) enter into poffeffion of your kingdom; but be affured, that your itay there fhall not be long." The government was now entirely in her hands, her creature Birague being chancellor, and fcarce any but her Italians being intrufted with the fecrets of the flate. These in effect were endeavouring to contrive means to pillage the people, and, in-Read of a regular and legal government, to establish an abfolute tyranny, under the direction of an ambitious woman, and her infolent favourites.

New troubles in the court of France, and a third party headed by the duke of Alençon. The courts of France and England continued fill to diffemble with each other. The queen-mother was afraid that Elizabeth would affift the Hugonots, and Elizabeth was fill apprehenfive of the Spaniards and the queen of Scots. In the mean time, the Hugonots perceiving, that, though the court had refufed to grant their demands, they had not courage enough to arreft their deputies, refolved to proceed in their fcheme of putting themfelves, once for all, in a poflure of defence, fo as to treat for the future in the quality of a body politic, and not as fubjects in arms against their prince. It was with this view that they formed a confederacy, into which, by the advice of monfieur La Noue, the people of Rochelle entered m. In confequence of this they began to ftir in other parts of France, and more efpecially in Normandy. The court directed three armies to be raifed for carrying on this fifth civil war, and, in the mean time, the queen-mother earnestly preffed the treaty of marriage with queen Elizabeth, in fayour of her third fon the duke of Alencon. This, Elizabeth feemed to encourage, and even granted that young prince a fafe-conduct to come and vifit her in her own dominions; which, though he folicited with warmth, yet, when he had got it, he did not use, being engaged at home in fome intrigues of a very extraordinary nature. His friends openly folicited for him the post of lieutenantgeneral, as his brother had enjoyed it. The king was averfe to this demand, and the queen-mother much more fo; but it could not well be refufed ": but, while this was in agitation, the Hugonots in arms in Normandy advanced a finall corps of cavalry very near St. Germains, where the court then refided. The defign was to have carcied off the duke of Alençon, who had confented to it, but they came ten days too foon, fo that he was not ready °. It occasioned, however, a dreadful confternation; and the Catholics, affecting to believe that there was a defign of returning the compliment of St. Bartholomew, retired in precipitation out of Paris; the queen-mother and her ladies amongst the rest ; and the next day the king himself went to the cafile of Bois de Vincennes, caufing the duke of Alençon and the king of Navarre to be put under a guard, and treating this as a new confpiracy against his perion P. The marshals Montmorency and Coffe, repairing to court to juffify themfelves, were arrefted and fent to the Bastile; the prince of Condé, and the other brothers of the marshal Montmorency would have fliared the fame fate, if the prince, who was then in his government of Picardy, had not very wifely retired to Strafburgh, where following once more the example of his chaplain, he declared his reconciliation to the church of Rome to have been forced and infincere, and, at his earneft requeft. was again admitted into communion with the Protestants of that city <sup>9</sup>. At court, La Moule, who had betrayed his mafter the duke of Alençon, and who was a ftrange compound of fuperflition and debauchery, loft his head upon a fcaffold, as did alfo the count de Coconas, a Piedmontefe, who pretended not to any religion, but had been very aftive in the bufinefs of St. Bartholomew. Tourtai, a man of lefs confequence, was broke alive upon the wheel<sup>1</sup>. The duke of Alençon made a mean confeffion, but the king of Navarre behaved with great fpirit and refolution, and treated the queen-mother with a degree of freedom that put her very much out of countenance<sup>3</sup>. He afcribed all the troubles of France to her arts, and affirmed the excited them to make herfelf neceffary.

In the mean time the queen-mother, who neglected nothing that might facilitate her views in favour of the duke of Anjou, procured her fon-in-law the duke of Lorrain to be invefted with the title of the king's lieutenantgeneral; and having, under colour of this new confpiracy, brought into danger most of those who were inclined to oppose her, began to act more openly and boldly, and as if the fovereign power had been folely in her hands. The wretched king was haftening to his grave, under the moft terrible agonies and tortures. He was little mafter of his own actions; and, though abfolute power had been his aim, he was by this time very fenfible that he had, in effect, no power at all. To recover it, he projected schemes of reformation; declared frequently and openly, that he defired no more than legal authority; that affairs of order and juffice fhould be left entirely to the parliaments; the direction of military affairs to the marshals; and that he would referve to himfelf the care only of reforming his court, and relieving his people. Some add, that he expreffed a refolution of removing from about him fuch as had advifed the maffacre : but it is very difficult to judge of the authorities on which these reports are founded; and belides, he was to infamous for his diffimulation, that we know not what to think of these declarations, even suppoling them to have been made : this is very certain, that his mother influenced him to the very laft. She had procured from him letters for the governors of provinces, and other officers civil and military, to obey her commands ; but, not fatisfied with thefe, a little before he died, fhe

After having thus performed all that the queen-mother had for him to do, he breathed his last on the 30th of May, which was Whitfunday, in the middle of the fourteenth year of his reign, and towards the close of the twenty-fourth year of his life ". His body was opened after his demife, and, upon infpection, it is faid, there appeared no marks of poifon, a circumftance which refuted the fuspicion that had fallen upon the duke of Alencon. Others allege that he was taken off by one who understood the mysteries of that detestable art fo well, as to remove enemies, without leaving grounds of difcovery. The common opinion of those times was, that his end was indeed out of the course of nature, but in confequence of the express judgment of God, for the cruelties he had exercifed on his fubjects, which he blafphemoufly imputed to a motive of religion (L).

(L) Charles IX. was tall, well made, robust, but stooped a little in his shoulders. He had a pale complexion, a fharp nofe, and quick, or rather haggard eyes. He had an extenfive capacity, a very retentive memory, much fagacity, a wonderful penetration, and great folidity in judgment. He spoke eafily, pertinently, and with dignity. He pretended to love learning and learned men, more especially poets, and was the patron of the great Ronfard. He fung well, and wrote verfes. He alfo wrote a treatife upon hunting, which has been fince published. He had perfonal courage, was very fober, naturally modeft, and not much inclined to women. Let us now fee how a prince with fo many good qualities came to make fo bad a figure. He had two ill qualities that are feldom found united, he was a deep diffembler, and yet paffionate to a degree of madnefs. He loved hunting immoderately : and from delighting in the blood of beafts, came to fpill that of men without concern. He feldom fpoke without fwearing, a vice which he caught from the count de Rhetz, his mother's instrument in corrupting his manners. He was as eafily provoked as he was hard to be appeafed. He had a violence in his temper which at once shewed itself, and was heightened by his diversions; for, befides his paffion for hunting, he was a great lover of tennis. and would also work frequently at the forge, being an excellent gunsmith. His impetuofity appeared even in his dancing, with which he fatigued himfelf and his whole court. He had one amusement fingular, and which fpoke his character; he coined falfe money with his own hands, and was never fo well pleafed as when he cheated people. The debauchery of his, or rather of his mother's court. ruined his morals and his temper. The neceffity he was under of managing opposite factions, taught him to difguife his fentiments, and his frequent difappointments infpired him with deep refentments. Hence it is faid, that, at the age of twenty, he excelled Tiberius in address, and equalled Nero in cruelty. After the maffacre on the eve of St. Bartholomew. he had a fiercenefs in his look, and a colour in his cheeks, which he never had before.

She refused Philip the Second, who was very defirous of marrying her, and died January 2, 1592, in the thirty-eighth year of her age. By her he had a daughter, Mary Elizabeth, to whom the queen of England was godmother. This young princefs died before the was fix years old. The king had alfo a fon by Mary Touchet, daughter of a gentleman of family, who had a confiderable office at Orleans. His fon by her was styled Charles de Valois, fucceffively grand prior of France, count of Auvergne, and duke of Angoulefme. Befides Mary Touchet, the king had at leaft two other mistreffes that are known. One of them was a young lady of admirable beauty and heroic virtue, who never liftened to

The two marshals were still in the Baftile, and the people of Paris, having fhewn a malignant joy at their imprisonment, the trufted that fortrefs to the guard of the townfmen, and thereby fecured both it and them. Another miltrefs of his was the wife of Charles de Gondi, Seigneur de la Tour, mafter of his wardrobe, brother to the count de Rhetz, and to the bifhop of Paris.
